Pulpit Commentary Verse 4. The metaphor is common see Proverbs For "mouth," the Septuagint reads "heart: The well spring of wisdom as a flowing gushing brook. Matthew Henry Commentary The well-spring of wisdom in the heart of a believer, continually supplies words of wisdom. The merits of a cause must be looked to, not the person. What mischief bad men do to themselves by their ungoverned tongues! How base are those that sow contention! Omissions of duty, and in duty, are fatal to the soul, as well as commissions of sin. The Divine power, made known in and through our Lord Jesus Christ, forms a strong tower for the believer, who relies on the Lord. How deceitful the defence of the rich man, who has his portion and treasure in this world! It is a strong city and a high wall only in his own conceit; for it will fail when most in need. They will be exposed to the just wrath of that Judge whom they despised as a Saviour. After the heart has been lifted up with pride, a fall comes. But honour shall be the reward of humility. Eagerness, with self-conceit, will expose to shame. Firmness of mind supports under many pains and trials. But when the conscience is tortured with remorse, no human fortitude can bear the misery; what then will hell be? We must get knowledge, not only into our heads, but into our hearts. Blessed be the Lord, who makes us welcome to come to his throne, without money and without price. May his gifts make room for him in our souls.

There, in the middle of the desert, they discover a well, an unexpected source of water. An unexpected source of hope, sustenance, and healing. He quotes Proverbs 5: The aleph signifies learning that is connected to the Source of all Life: The well, on the other hand, is joined directly to the source of an ever-flowing spring. At Hebrew College, we are devoted to the study of Torah “in all its fullness and complexity” as essential for a vibrant, meaningful, creative, and inclusive Jewish community and Jewish future. But this is not just an academic exercise. True study of Torah is connected to life. True study of Torah connects us to the Source of all Life. There are windows on the walls of our Beit Midrash, and we look outside of them every day. We look out at the breathtaking beauty of the world around us. And we also look out at the heart-stopping cruelty of the world around us. What does Torah demand of us “today? To craft such a policy” and to enforce such a policy “demands a willful forgetfulness and failure of imagination. The person following such orders cannot afford to remember what it felt like to be a child in need of safety and protection. The person following such orders has to have found a way “at least temporarily” to forget that we are all children of God, to forget that we all thirst for the same water, to forget that we are all nourished by the same ever-flowing spring. We were all implicated in this policy as long as we allowed it to be carried out in our name. It appears that the public outcry about this issue has begun to register and prompt some rethinking on the part of policy-makers in the current administration, but there is still a long way to go to ensure that families and children at our border are treated with dignity and afforded the basic human rights protected by U. Wherever we are, may we find ways to overcome the collective forgetfulness and failure of imagination that has brought us to this place. May we merit the study of Torah that helps us find our way back to each other, back to the Source of all Life, back to the flowing waters, back to the softened heart. In the words of W.

When I first came across this poem, I was fascinated with how the words and phrases were structured in a way that formed an image. With seeing this new artistic technique, I researched Guillaume Apollinaire in order to get a better understanding of what provoked him to become a Dada artist. With this, I learned that he had joined the French army to defend his adopted country in World War I where he later fought directly on the front lines poetry foundation. The fact that he joined the army led me to believe that when he created this collection of Calligrams, he may have had mixed feelings about war as even the title for this collection has two contradicting aspects, peace and war. He may have been two sided with the war because even though Dada and its artists stemmed from anti-war ideologies, he may have had the desire to fight for his country since he alone could not prevent war from happening. No matter what his feelings and opinions may have been though, the overall tone in this collection is that war is something detrimental as it induces immense suffering and emotional turmoil for everyone. Although each specific poem in this collection is very unique and distinct in its own way, the method that Apollinaire used was universal as every page became a canvas for experimentation in which he created new, spatial relationships in order to give the reader the opportunity to see the poem through multiple ways Words and eggs. When comparing all of the poems, it is obvious that none of them share the same visual structure and instead have their own form for which creates their own image. Through this unique, visual formation of verses and lines it is obvious that Apollinaire abandons the traditional and familiar way to read a poem. In the end, this format used by Apollinaire created unique images that are the main focal point for each poem and give the reader an opportunity to use their imagination for how they want to interpret it. In this particular poem, The Bleeding-Heart Dove and the Fountain, one can easily see this experimental form Apollinaire played with. From looking at this poem, the reader can see an image of a dove that seems to be flying atop a fountain that spews out water. Along with this image, this poem can be read and interpreted differently due to how the stanzas and verses are structured. In the middle stanza, there is no clear cut linear formation where every line distinctively moves from left to right across the page. Rather, there seems to be a vertical line that forms down the middle of each horizontal line as it acts as the center of the fountain. From this, it is evident that each horizontal line eventually curves down as it reaches the vertical line. On the opposite side of this vertical line, the second part of the line then either curves up or down, making it difficult to determine what the second part of the line is. Another unique form technique that is evident in this particular poem is that there are different sized words and letters as well as only some letters are bolded. The fact that some letters are larger in size and bolded such as the letter D in the first stanza, the question mark in the second stanza and the letter O in the final stanza, depicts this unique and unconventional format style Apollinaire liked to use. Although I am not sure why some letters are bolded and larger, why some words are all capitalized, or why some phrases are larger, I believe that this was just another way to make the image more appealing to the reader. Overall, it is difficult to determine what the exact structure for this poem is as well as how it should be read which seems to mimic what Apollinaire had hoped for all along. Like the format, the content and context for this poem are also unique as Apollinaire stems away from traditional phrases as he comes up with his own description for objects and emotions. I interpreted from the three stanzas that this poem is about war and its effects on everyone. The fact that the fountain is weeping and praying alludes to the idea that it weeps out of sorrow for what the war has done and the negative impacts it has left on everyone. It alludes to the idea that these rose-laurel flowers will eventually grow in place of where these dead soldiers once lay as they will grow from their blood and will bleed their blood in abundance. In reading this final stanza, I interpreted that the narrator does not really have any hope for the future of his country as men will continue to die and lay in their own blood if war continues to exist. Overall, the context of this final stanza seems to sum up the content in the entire poem as the words and phrases that are used seem to portray the harsh realities of war and how those who fought will die and those who are left behind are left in
