At the same time, in order to achieve cultural control of the Chinese nation, the Japanese special agencies in Hong Kong searched and captured Chinese patriots and cultural celebrities who were stranded in Hong Kong.

Little took place for hundreds of years afterward, although 30 guards were stationed there in As a result, the Qing authorities felt it necessary to improve the fort in order to rule the area and check further British influence. The improvements, including the formidable defensive wall , were completed in The Walled City was captured by rebels during the Taiping Rebellion in before being retaken a few weeks later. China was allowed to continue to keep officials there as long as they did not interfere with the defence of British Hong Kong. The following year, the Governor, Sir Henry Blake , suspected that the Viceroy of Canton was using troops to aid resistance to the new arrangements. Though the British claimed ownership of the Walled City, they did little with it over the following few decades. Aside from such institutions, however, the Walled City became a mere curiosity for British colonials and tourists to visit; it was labelled as "Chinese Town" in a map. By only the yamen, the school and one house remained. Refugees from mainland China because of the Chinese Civil War post poured in to take advantage of British protection the Walled City was a Chinese territory but surrounded by British land , and 2, squatters occupied the Walled City by It was a very complex place, difficult to generalise about, a place that seemed frightening but where most people continued to lead normal lives. A place just like the rest of Hong Kong. The elevation of the buildings begins to reach its maximum height. In January , a fire broke out that destroyed over 2, huts, home to nearly 3, families and 17, total people. It was only during a trial for a murder that occurred within the Walled City that the Hong Kong government was ruled to have jurisdiction there. By this time, however, the Walled City was virtually ruled by the organised crime syndicates known as triads. The Walled City had become such a haven for criminals that police would venture into it only in large groups. With public support, particularly from younger residents, the continued raids gradually eroded drug use and violent crime. The city became extremely densely populated, with over 30, people in buildings occupying little more than 7 acres 2. As a result, the city reached its maximum size by the late s and early s; a height restriction of 13 to 14 storeys had been imposed on the city due to the flight path of planes heading towards Kai Tak Airport. Eight municipal pipes provided water to the entire structure, although more could have come from wells. Numerous small factories and businesses thrived inside the Walled City, and some residents formed groups to organise and improve daily life there. Charities, religious societies, and other welfare groups were gradually introduced to the City. While medical clinics and schools went unregulated, the Hong Kong government did provide some services, such as water supply and mail delivery. Construction work on Kowloon Walled City Park started the following month. It was opened officially by Governor Chris Patten a few months later on 22 December. It is divided into eight landscape features, [22] with the fully restored yamen as its centrepiece. Along with its foundation, other remains included two stone plaques inscribed with "South Gate" and "Kowloon Walled City" from the South Gate and a flagstone path that had led up to it. It was restored in and is now found near the centre of the park. In spite of its transformation from a fort into an urban enclave, the Walled City retained the same basic layout. The original fort was built on a slope [38] and consisted of a 2. Informal estimates, on the other hand, often mistakenly included the neighbouring squatter village of Sai Tau Tsuen. Contrary to what many outsiders believed, most residents of the Walled City behaved similarly to other Hong Kong natives. Parents used them to relax, and children would play or do homework there after school.
