The Influential Fundraiser by Bernard Ross and Clare Segal is a must read for breakthrough fundraisers everywhere. As a Director of Fundraising with over 17 years fundraising experience in the voluntary sector it reminded me of what I tend to do often without thinking, but not always brilliantly.

The last I heard NP fundraising was not supposed to be about doing mere sales work when soliciting. December 14, This book was merely OK. I found it to be a book on sales for fundraisers in the nonprofit community. Basically they all say: The influential fundraiser is a major gifts fundraiser. This is not something the authors specifically say in the book. And that is one of the reasons for the low rating. I could not believe the authors mixed 1 uninspired email solicitations, 2 dull fundraising dinners, and 3 cookie-cutter direct mail campaigns with the subject matter of this book. Those tools and techniques for nonprofit fundraising have their time and place. But it is not during the major gift solicitations that are done face-to-face. In my humble opinion there are two great books on high-end gift solicitation. I have read them both and posted positive reviews on Amazon for them. I have gotten positive feedback from some of my SCORE clients who have used it after I recommended they take a look at it. Major gift solicitation is about planning how to extract cash from a donor. It requires having a written Case for Support. And it requires having someone who has made a large cash gift to the organization to do the ask. The person performing this last step may enjoy reading the instant book being reviewed. But as long as that person has good people skills and has made a large gift to the organization already, then everything will probably fall into place just fine without reading the book being reviewed. Examine the Search Inside feature Amazon offers. There you can examine the detailed Table of Contents for this book. I found it quite odd that the book was divided into 5 parts, but some parts only has 1 or 2 chapters when others had as many as 3.

Using the psychology of persuasion to achieve outstanding results by Bernard Ross and Clare Segal. Forget what you know or thought you knew about this business. Ross and Segal have outlined in detail the steps required not only to raise more money, but to also win over your board or staff. This book will even help to get your teenagers to clean their rooms! The practical advice laid out in this book will help you to: Understand what motivates your donors. Immediately establish and build rapport. Present your proposal in a way that is tailored to the psychology of the person you are trying to influence. Take systematic steps to make sure you are prepared and know the desired outcome. Understand and respond appropriately to your donors point of view. View original image With so much information, you expect the book to read like a textbook. It is so well written that the words fall off the page. I actually read it from the beginning to the end in one sitting. Wonderful examples of their ideas in action are interwoven throughout to help you to see how the exercises can be applied in the real world. For example, the story of a priest from Bolivia who used the metaphor of an actual brick to make his case and explain his vision. The authors outline how the five cogs of passion, proposal, preparation, persuasion and persistence work together and explain how this has raised hundreds of millions of dollars for clients of the Management Centre around the world. Now Ross and Segal are sharing their secrets of success so that more fundraisers and causes will benefit. I do have one concern about this fundraising approach. I would have liked to see more about maintaining our integrity as fundraisers while using this powerful psychology to ask for gifts. So stop whatever you are doing. These skills of persuasion will need to be used very carefully. We will soon see if, as promised at the end of the book, this site offers an opportunity for dialogue or more information. I think we need to talk more about the ethics involved in fundraising using the psychology of persuasion. In the meantime, inspired by the lessons from this book, I wish I could rewind and replay every one of the solicitations and board meetings I participated in last year. I will no doubt keep this book very close. But if you need to buy the book to help you get your children to clean their rooms, that would be just fine. She works extensively in Europe and the USA specialising in presentation, influence and communication skills.
