Back in I wrote several pieces on this topic and feel that in the spirit of summer reading it would be fun to dust them off and share them here. Dorfman is a wonderful, simple book that goes through the English alphabet presenting a key word for each letter. Dorfman writes about a wide range of practices and beliefs, ranging from Breathing to Goals to Mantra to Umpires. There are several entries that relate directly and beautifully to specific lean concepts. The "A" stands, of course, for "Act". The other, The Chrysanthemum and the Bat, is actually my favorite, and is one of my favorite books about Japan, but is very hard to find. Baseball so will be much easier for you to locate. And the themes and even much of the content of the two books is essentially the same. There are more books that try to describe, explain, analyze, interpret Japanese culture and society than there are even about lean. Most either oversimplify and over-criticize or over-praise or dive so deep into arcane social-cultural historical hair-splitting as to be inaccessible to all but the experts. But, Whiting explains it all through the lens of baseball, with funny and hard-to-believe anecdotes. Baseball was transplanted from the U. This was when Japan at gunpoint ended its almost year period of self-imposed isolation from the world. By the s, baseball had become thoroughly "Japanized". Baseball in Japan looks the same on the surface as its American forerunner, but the differences are many and illuminating. Here are a few gems from the book: No less an authority than David Halberstam agrees with me: The original name of Japan the country the name they gave themselves was "Big Harmony". Possibly the best anthropological work on Japanese business was an ethnographic study of a bank, called "For Harmony and Strength", which author Thomas Rohlens borrowed from the banks motto. If they were born that way, why would they have to train so hard to get there? So there you have it, baseball and PDCA and science and lean thinking, all mixed and stirred into a fun summer cocktail. For those of you in non-baseball countries - most of the world even though we do call the championship games in October the "World Series" - no intent to disrespect your favorite sport; I do think the game will be broadcast around much of the globe. As for those of you attending the Coaching Summit next week, we can explore together how coaching methods contribute to better performance regardless of the venue: The views expressed in this post do not necessarily represent the views or policies of The Lean Enterprise Institute.
