Share Tweet Google Pinterest Subscribe For years I heard about morning meetings in the classroom, but was hesitant to use them, the main reason being that they take up to 30 minutes of your time in the morning. However, a couple of years ago I decided to try it out, just to see what the fuss was all about. I can tell you that I LOVE doing morning meeting in my classroom, and will definitely be doing it again once I return to teaching when my kids are a bit older. People are often unsure how to begin doing morning meetings in their classroom. It outlines everything you need to know about doing morning meetings, and has a lot of great ideas for activities to do during meetings. I used many ideas from this book, and also integrated some of my own. In a nutshell, here is my morning meeting agenda. Greeting – The greeting serves several purposes. Lastly, I think that the greeting is a great way for students to interact positively with each other. Some ideas include greeting with a handshake, silent greeting, greeting in another language, rolling a ball to another person and greeting them, etc. This might include making corrections to a sentence, talking about a particular math skill, or reviewing another concept from earlier in the week. I also like to get the kids moving whenever possible. If you have an interactive whiteboard in your classroom, consider getting students up to participate in an activity such as representing numbers or skip-counting. Another game that my students have always loved is to practice counting in another language. Have all students stand in a circle, with one person in the middle. The person in the middle bounces a basketball while the others count silently in the second language. When the student stops bouncing be sure to set a limit on number of bounces! If the student guesses correctly, he then gets to go into the middle of the circle. Student Talk – This is one of my favorite parts of morning meeting. Students can sign up to talk about something; however, there are rules to follow! First of all, it is not a show-and-tell, so there are no objects associated with it. The second, and most important rule, is that students cannot say more than three sentences about the topic. This serves a couple of purposes. Closing – In the closing portion of the meeting, I like to briefly talk about the schedule for the day, or any special events that will be happening. This is also a good opportunity to set expectations for the upcoming transition into class time. So yes, morning meeting does take up some time. But for me, the advantages are SO worth it. I believe that classroom community definitely improves as a result of morning meetings. Students seem to have better relationships and interact in a more positive way. It sets a good tone for the day, and is a nice routine for beginning the day. Additionally, you can easily integrate review and important skills into the meeting, so that learning is taking place. I would love to hear from you if you have read it to see what you think! If you can add any tips from your experiences with morning meetings, please feel free to comment below! Have a great day!

3: Using Morning Meetings in your Classroom - Shelley Gray

Morning Meeting is a powerful teaching tool for building community, increasing student investment, and improving academic and social skills. This comprehensive guidebook has helped thousands of teachers across the country use Morning Meeting to launch their school days.

May 06, Categories: More than twenty years later, her words still seem profoundly sad to me: It made me feel like it really mattered that I came. I vowed to learn something from it and became more intentional about greeting my students. I stationed myself by the door and tried to say a little something to each one as they entered, or at least to make eye contact and smile at every student, not just the ones like Sue for whom I had an instinctive affinity. Gradually I realized how much I was learning at my post by the door. I have learned a lot since then. It is good for students to be noticed, to be seen by their teacher. But it is only a start, not enough by itself. They must notice and be noticed by each other as well. Years after I taught Sue, I joined the staff of a school that used the Responsive Classroom approach. There, I saw teachers teaching students to greet each other, to speak to each other, to listen to each other. I saw students start each day together in Morning Meeting where noticing and being noticed were explicit goals. Today, many children in schools around the country launch their school days in Morning Meetings. Morning Meeting is a particular and deliberate way to begin the day, a way that builds a community of caring and motivated learners. The Format Morning Meeting consists of four sequential components and lasts twenty to thirty minutes each day. The components provide daily opportunities for children to practice the skills of greeting, listening and responding, speaking to a group, reading, group problem-solving, and noticing and anticipating. The four components are: Greeting—Children greet each other by name, often including handshaking, singing, movement, or other activities. Sharing—Students share some news or information about themselves or what they are learning and respond to each other, articulating their thoughts, feelings, and ideas in a positive manner. Group Activity—The whole class does a short, inclusive activity together, reinforcing learning and building class cohesion through active participation. Morning Message—Students practice academic skills and warm up for the day ahead by reading and discussing a daily note to the class posted by their teacher. Teachers and students crave a certain amount of predictability and routine in the school day, especially at the start. The format of Morning Meeting is predictable, but there is plenty of room for variation. Meetings reflect the style and flavor of individual teachers and groups. The mixture of routine and surprise, of comfort and challenge, makes Morning Meeting a treasured and flexible teaching tool. Morning Meeting sets the tone for learning The way we begin each day in our classroom sets the tone for learning and speaks volumes about what and whom we value, about our expectations for the way we will treat each other, and about the way we believe learning occurs. Children notice whether they are greeted warmly or overlooked, whether the classroom feels chaotic and unpredictable or ordered and comforting. Every detail of their experience informs students about their classroom and their place in it. When we start the day with everyone together, face-to-face, welcoming each person, sharing news, listening to individual voices, and communicating as a caring group, we make several powerful statements. We say that every person matters. We say that the way we interact individually and as a group matters. We say that our culture is one of friendliness and thoughtfulness. We say that we can accomplish hard work and make important discoveries together. We say that teachers hold authority, even though they are a part of the circle. We say that this is a place where courtesy and warmth and safety reign. In order to learn, we must take risks—offering up a tentative answer we are far from sure is right or trying out a new part in the choir when we are not sure we can hit the notes. We are more willing to take these risks when we know we will be respected and valued, no matter the outcome. We must trust in order to risk, and Morning Meeting helps create a climate of trust. Morning Meeting merges academic, social, and emotional learning Morning Meeting provides an arena where distinctions that define social, emotional, and academic skills fade, and learning becomes an integrated experience. Teachers have long known and researchers are now confirming that social skills are not just something to be taught so that children behave well enough to get on with the real business of schooling. Rather, social skills are inextricably intertwined with cognitive growth and intellectual progress.

A person who can listen well, who can frame a good question and has the assertiveness to pose it, who can examine a situation from a number of perspectives, will be a strong learner. All those skills—skills essential to academic achievement—must be modeled, experienced, practiced, extended, and refined in the context of social interaction. Morning Meeting is a forum in which all that happens. A microcosm of the way we wish our schools to be. The time one commits to Morning Meeting is an investment which is repaid many times over. The sense of belonging and the skills of attention, listening, expression, and cooperative interaction developed in Morning Meeting are a foundation for every lesson, every transition time, every lining-up, every handling of an upset or conflict, all day and all year long. Morning Meeting is a microcosm of the way we wish our schools to be—communities full of learning, safe and respectful and challenging for all. This comprehensive guidebook has helped thousands of teachers use Morning Meeting to launch their school days. Clear explanations of each component and its purpose, with sample greetings, activities, and message charts. Includes step-by-step guidelines for implementing Morning Meeting in any K-8 classroom.
