

1: Relationship | Definition of Relationship by Merriam-Webster

"In a new relationship, it's really easy to blow out too fast in the honeymoon' phase and want to spend every waking second together," says Meredith Fineman, founder of Fifty First (J)Dates.

Guys tend to be much better at seeing a situation for what it is. They see the red flags, they hear the alarm bells, and they leave. Instead of running away, she sees the good in him, the positive qualities, the man he could be. She empathizes with his situation and hopes her love will heal him. Instead of getting swept up in how cute or charming or exciting a guy is, ask yourself if he has the qualities you want in a long-term partner, and look at how he treats you in general. That is the real question to consider, the one that would have saved me personally from years of heartache and pain had I given it any thought. A new relationship can become a breeding ground where all your insecurities run amuck. If you feel insecure about yourself or the relationship, nothing he says will change that. If you put pressure on the relationship, you squeeze the life out of it and it stops being enjoyable and fun. Just realize he does and hold on to that conviction. A big mistake most of us make in relationships is getting caught up in trying to prove ourselves to the other person. A man can tell when a woman is trying to impress him, and it comes across as desperate. When you try to win him over, you create an unbalanced dynamic where he is the authority on, and judge of, your worth. If he seems to be losing interest, you panic and try to do whatever you can to win him back. People only fall in love with those they feel secure around. If you have an agenda and see him as a means to fill a void within yourself, he will feel it and his guard will reflexively go up, making it impossible to develop a real connection. When you abandon your friendships, you create an empty space that the relationship is left to fill. Humans are social creatures; the need to connect and form bonds is essential to our emotional well-being. A lot of women who become overly dependent on men or their romantic relationships are lacking close platonic relationships. They may have a lot of friends, but these friendships are superficial and lacking in intimacy. We all want to be seen and accepted for who we are. Try to focus on deepening the bonds you have with people in your life, be it friends or family. Try to form real, genuine connections. You must always continue to do things you love. People in unhealthy relationships often give up things they enjoy for the sake of the relationship. The more you abandon other areas that fulfilled you, the more you expect him to compensate. You should also not stop pursuing your dreams and goals. There is nothing men love more than a positive, happy woman. Similarly, there is nothing more repulsive to a man than a negative, whiny woman who is always in a bad mood. Yes, life can be hard and sometimes we just really gotta complain, but try not to make this a habit. The more comfortable we are with someone, the more comfortable we may feel unleashing a daily litany of complaints and grievances. No one really wants to be on the receiving end of this, though. And no one, man or woman, likes to be around a negative, unhappy person. In your relationship, and in your life in general, try to focus on being happy and positive. See the good and try to let that radiate through you. It involves more than just not complaining, though. You can be saying all the right things, but if you feel negative inside, it will still come across. Our vibe attracts people or drives them away. Why does this happen? Instead, you just enjoy your interactions with this other person and if it works out, great. Now with the guys you do want there is more at stake. This worry leads you to feeling upset, and this can take several forms: All of this comes from stressing over the relationship, which leads me to my next point â€œ!

2: Things you shouldn't do in a new relationship

A new relationship can be tough to navigate, but that doesn't mean it's impossible! Many people have no problem finding their way around a new relationship's difficulties, but for the rest of us.

Rebounds and Replays The Next Relationship: How wonderful it feels to be desired and appreciated, to no longer feel rejected. What a welcome relief from empty weekends and lonely nights, from feeling so restless and so single. A spark of life replaces despair and self-doubt. There is even the return of romance and sex. The future now has some glimmer of possibility rather than the grim blankness of nothing-to-look-forward-to. Your new partner seems just the opposite of your old partner: You are having more fun than you have had in years. You are reexperiencing a bit of adolescent energy that you may have thought would never be rekindled. It makes you smile and you feel your spirit rebounding from the pain of your marriage and divorce. Could it be that your ex and all that went wrong is being Xed out? If only this new relationship could keep going as smoothly and happily as it began. Some new relationships do, but it frequently happens that problems begin to crop up in the new relationship and that they are typical enough to be somewhat predictable. What could go wrong? It is common for there to be a crisis as the enthusiasm of the new relationship leads to emotional attachment and the relationship moves toward the possibility of commitment. What is the source of this anxiety? One possibility is that you have detected a new wrinkle in the relationship. Traits emerge that had never been seen before. And then, suddenly, there is the awareness that what you are seeing and experiencing is all too familiar. What is going on? In this case, the new relationship is no longer masking old problems. It may be that the emotional impact of the divorce is resurfacing in the midst of this new relationship. When our new partner, who initially was the opposite of our old partner, disappoints us or begins to get demanding or starts to pull back, it is as if our old partner has returned and we have fallen back into all our old issues. Often this awareness is enough to jinx the new relationship. Many new relationships and many second marriages do not make it for this reason. For instance, divorce typically causes a financial crisis, and it usually takes several years before people feel they are able to stand on their own two feet with confidence. New self-confidence, achieved in other areas of life, can form the basis for a new and healthier love relationship. Of course, old problems will threaten to resurface and new anxieties often come into play. Will diving into a new relationship wipe out my feeling of greater independence? Will moving back into a relationship threaten the hard-won accomplishment of having become the chief decision-maker in my own life? For some, there is a determination never to give up the independence that has been attained at such a cost and through such an effort. Can I once again be a partner without losing myself in the process? These questions can only be answered by venturing once again into the challenge of a new relationship. Hopefully, the lessons learned about the value of relationship and the value of independence will see you through and provide a firm foundation for a more emotionally and psychologically satisfying partnership. ### 3: The Next Relationship: Rebounds and Replays

New relationships are fragile. If you rush through important intimacy stages, the relationship takes a hit and often ends prematurely. Following are a few suggestions about how to slow things down and keep your new relationship on a healthy track. This may seem like a no-brainer, but lurching.

I have come to learn, through countless emotional outbursts, anxious moments, doubt-filled thoughts, hard conversations, and extreme emotional discomfort, that my belief of the ideal relationship was pretty misguided. When I met my boyfriend, I knew he was what I had been searching for. He was open, loving, honest, kind, caring, and funny, and his spirit just sparkled through his eyes. However, I was nervous. I would keep track of how many hours he was away and would share how hard it was for me to trust him. We would talk openly about my feelings and issues because I never blamed him or asked him to change his actions. I just knew that I had to communicate what was going on for me in order to sort out my feelings and for us to be able to work together on healing. Our conversations and my fears would bring things up for him, as well as emotions and fears from his past and how he felt controlled and suppressed by me now. I have grown to realize that all relationships have stages. When we meet someone new and begin spending time with them, these stages can seem scary and can inflict doubt. I hope to shed some light on these stages and help you feel more comfortable with experiencing them for yourself.

New Relationship Bliss The first stage in most new relationships is bliss! We are perfect, the other person is perfect, and the relationship just flows. You make time for one another however you can, you communicate with each other constantly, and it just feels easy. We talked every day. We each put forth equal effort to get to know one another, and I was open and loving toward any part of his behavior. I had patience, understanding, and joy in getting to know his quirks, thoughts, and patterns, and he had seemingly limitless energy to listen to me, talk to me, and sympathize with my emotions. It never seems to last! You know the one. This seems to be the perfect time for our fear to kick in. This is what happened in my relationship. My emotional triggers went crazy, and all of a sudden my past fears of emotional and physical abandonment kicked in. I no longer felt emotionally stable, relaxed, or happy. And I wondered all the time why things had changed. Was it something I did wrong? Did I expect too much? Was I being completely unreasonable, or did I just have too much baggage? Can we talk about this a bit? Every time I felt upset I had to force myself to bring up my fear of our relationship ending, fear of being abandoned, and fear that we would never connect on a deep level. The fear is there as a message. By owning our stuff, we are taking care of our own healing, and this is what keeps our past from damaging the relationship in the future. The best part is that we get to see how our partners handle this as well. Our relationships need this stage and this shift from the easy, wonderful bliss, because without it, our bonds would never grow. If things are easy all the time, where is the room for true, deep intimacy? How do we learn to truly support our significant others, and ourselves, if we never experience pain, anxiety, anger, or annoyance? And the truth is there are deeper, richer, more intimate layers to us as humans and to our relationships. Once you have opened your heart and begun communication around your fear, a small amount of vulnerability has been introduced into the relationship, and there is room for your partner to do the same. There is room for you to grow together. If we wait for the problem to just go away, we essentially keep the cycle of anxiety, doubt, and tension going, because our actions, words, and energy reflect our uneasiness in the relationship. I opened up to my partner two weeks into dating about my anxiety, fears, and panicked thoughts about seeming needy and wanting too much. I told him I was scared I was going to push him away. When I opened up and took responsibility for my feelings, it brought us closer together. Acknowledging my anxiety without expecting him to change anything diffused the tension within our relationship, and I believe this is why we are still together today. Stay connected to yourself and speak your truth—the whole, messy, amazing truth. Let your partner see the whole you, quirks and all, and enjoy taking your walls down together, brick by brick. She is passionate about helping single, professional women create clear, simple goals that will guide them towards loving themselves and being excited about dating and relationships.
