Premise[edit] Based on show producer Eric L. The show is produced by The Barn Productions Inc. The show purports to describe the daily lives of Delta Force called "The Unit" in the show operators during training and operational missions, as well as their families back home. The theme music for the first and second seasons was "Fired Up" by Robert Duncan. Duncan also created "Walk the Fire", a second segment used as a theme since season three. Summary[edit] "The Unit" is the U. Army colloquial term for Delta Force. Its recruits are selected from the Army primarily from the 75th Ranger Regiment and Special Forces groups. The few who pass selection then undergo several more years of sophisticated and rigorous training for counterterrorism , reconnaissance , and direct-action missions. In a television interview, series creator Eric Haney—who is a former Delta Force operator—stated that the term "Delta Force" is never used in the spec ops community. The official cover name of the unit in the show is the "rd Logistical Studies Group". The Unit is based at a fictional army post, "Fort Griffith". The location of Fort Griffith is never explicitly stated, but in episode , a bank statement of the lead character clearly shows an address for Fort Griffith, MO , which puts it a few miles west of St. Greenwood, Missouri , is a small town located southeast of Kansas City. However, the red, white, and blue license plate is from the state of Idaho. This license plate can be seen in almost all the episodes. Unit members also wear the shoulder sleeve insignia of the inactivated 24th Infantry Division on their class A uniforms, as well as the shoulder crest of the th Parachute Infantry Regiment , "Strike Hold", currently part of the 1st BCT of the 82nd Airborne Division. In later episodes, unit members are shown as wearing the Special Operations Command patch on their class A uniforms. If this bypasses the command hierarchy is unknown, though in the season-four episode, "The Spear of Destiny", a side character receives confidential mission information and when questioned on who sent her, replies, "the Secretary of Defense". However, in the episode, "The Broom Cupboard", the President gives orders directly to Jonas for a unit mission. They are responsible for maintaining the "rd Logistical Studies Group" cover in all interactions with anyone who is not a unit family member. Their husbands are, in fact, still performing highly dangerous missions, but they are not permitted to know specifics, such as where their husbands are deployed, of what their training routines consist, how long their assignments will last, or even if their husbands are safe. If a member of the unit is killed in action, the actual mode of death is not told to the families. A cover story concurrent with a member of the Logistical Studies Unit is created. The wives themselves are encouraged to form a close, cohesive military family based on the common knowledge and strife to which this inevitably leads. The unit has an unconventional structure. With the size of a company—about operators—it is commanded by a colonel companies are usually commanded by captains; colonels usually command elements such as brigades or regiments. The CO , Colonel Ryan, normally wears a "sanitized" uniform bearing absolutely no tapes, such as his name, or even U. Army, or rank insignia. An ODA, formerly known as an "A-Team", has weapons sergeants, engineering sergeants, medical sergeants, communications sergeants, etc. He has also threatened the wives with closing the unit down, and restarting it somewhere else under another cover—forcing the uprooting of all families involved. The unit deploys throughout the world, and both the Army and United States government have the ability to deny the existence of the unit and any of its members to prevent the onset of international incidents. Their uniforms are commonly not standard Army issue, which makes denying their connection with the US Army easier if they are killed or captured. Unit members can and are sometimes also working as protection details for U. White, Green, Blue, Black. These are usually used when working directly with American civilians, other English speakers not trained for emergencies, or on counterterrorism missions. According to Jonas Blane, the order of precedence for his team after he is disabled, is, from top to bottom:

Not all adult missing persons are the victims of kidnapping, murders, or some other criminal act. There are a variety of reasons why a person voluntarily disappears including mental illness, depression, substance abuse, credit problems, abusive relationships, or marital discord. Any adult person can simply walk away, and choose to ignore family, friends, associates and employers. You can go to any LAPD Area station near where the missing person resides, or make a telephonic report by calling the local non-emergency telephone number of the Area station in the jurisdiction in which the missing person is a resident. Be prepared to provide information on the missing person, including birth date or age, physical descriptions, and most importantly, any medical information. Police will also need to know the circumstances surrounding the disappearance and the last location where the missing person had been seen or was known to be. Also provide any known associates and telephone numbers of persons who know the missing person. Other helpful information that may be provided: When an adult person has been reported missing to police, he or she is entered into a nationwide database; this will assist other law enforcement agencies in finding the missing person. As a general rule, all people have a right to be left alone, and police intrusion into their lives must be minimal. Once the missing person is found by police, the Department will notify the person who made the report. However, police cannot disclose the location or whereabouts of the missing person without his or her consent. If the missing person returns on his or her own. It is highly likely the missing person will return on his or her own, or contact family and friends. If this occurs, you must notify the police as soon as possible. You can call the adult Missing Persons Unit, weekdays 7am to 4pm , at For after hours, or on the weekends, please leave a message. Please keep in mind, the missing person may choose not to disclose his or her whereabouts to you, or the circumstances of his or her disappearance. If the person chooses to do so, listen carefully, show concern, and offer to seek professional assistance if they show signs of depression or need medical attention. Many people who voluntarily disappear do so because of stress or substance abuse. There may be a need for professional help or family counseling. Check for appropriate social services through Los Angeles County. The majority of missing person cases are solved within a few days or weeks. However, there are times when investigations may go on for several months or even years. In such situations, you may want to enlist the services of a private investigator to assist in your search. The California Department of Justice web-site may offer guidance in selecting a reputable private investigator. You may want to consider the use of posters to aid in the search. If you have posters made up, please advise the detective assigned to your case. If you should change addresses or telephone numbers, please notify the detective assigned to your case. If you fail to keep in contact or move, the case may be closed out. You have several alternatives: Social Security Administration Office in your area. If you have a Social Security Number for the person you are looking for, you may write a letter to the missing person, put it in an envelope with his or her name on it. Write another letter to the Social Security Administration Office explaining that you are looking for this person. Be sure to include the Social Security Number of the missing person in this letter.

Oct 19, 4: In the years since, Cloutier says he thought about his friend every day, hoping to catch sight of him on the subway and wondering if the man he thought of like a brother was safe somewhere. Skandaraj Navaratnam, known to friends as Skanda, went missing in I would have felt better knowing there was a unit just dedicated to looking for missing people. It consists of two lead detectives, four detective constables as investigators, and one analyst. New unit reviewing cases going back 28 years The team has spent the last few months bringing together information on every missing persons cases the service has handled since This means the unit is likely examining more than , cases. Other police services in Ontario, like Ottawa and Hamilton, have had them for years. And across the country, other major cities have designated units as well, including Vancouver, Edmonton, and the oldest, Winnipeg, which started in These units in western Canada currently all have a legislative leg up on investigators in Ontario. Manitoba, Alberta and B. Before the legislation passed police were only able to get those kinds of records if they had evidence of a crime or foul play. Gallant hopes that will change soon. So why has it taken so long for Toronto police to establish a missing persons unit? The way police investigate missing persons cases has been "an evolving discussion for many, many years," according to Staff Supt. Myron Demkiw, who oversees the new unit and all detective operations. Haran Vijayanathan was one of the more outspoken voices amid that "public sentiment. One such case is that of Russell Tucker. having the means to be completely free from public view while in bed.

They are also shown utilising heavy weaponry such as bazookas, machine guns, mortars, and in Terror of the Zygons, a depth-charge launcher. They wear PLCE pouches on police tac-vests, and also wear riot-protection arm pads and gloves, and have side-handle batons and quick-cuffs for arrests. Among these are special ammunition described by the Brigadier in Battlefield as armour-piercing rounds with a solid core and Teflon coating which "could go through a Dalek". The software, or at least the results from the translation, can be loaded on a hand-held device. During the story, the laboratory is dedicated to studying cubes that appeared out of nowhere. There is also mention of them using helicopters and tanks while testing the destructibility of the cubes. UNIT is also shown to at least have access to the Under-Gallery, a secret gallery containing works of art dating back to the Elizabethan era that Elizabeth I ordered locked away as they were too dangerous for the public. There was also the assault team, who wore pattern fatigues and dark berets with the same UNIT insignia. All ranks are given khaki-coloured zip-up jackets without lapels, which are worn over tan rolled-neck sweaters. The Brigadier retained his No. The UNIT patches and tan berets remain standard, except for the Brigadier and Yates, who also wore caps with their rank insignia. They made a small cameo appearance in The Five Doctors, which sees Colonel Crichton wearing service dress and a Sergeant in barrack dress, both with the oval patches on their uniform. Captain Yates returns in the serial also wearing service dress but with no markings. Their appearance in this serial is close to the real-world United Nations Peacekeeping troop outfits. They have a new UNIT insignia patch of a winged globe, which is worn the upper sleeves and beret. There is also a Czech engineer team wearing Czech camouflage with the same UN issued blue beret as the convoy. The Brigadier returns, wearing at different times service dress, barrack dress, and DPM while wearing a cap rather than beret. Only the female officers wore headwear, the Army officer a garrison cap, the Navy officer a white female variation combination cap. Here, a new insignia has been designed based on the Battlefield version. Commanding officers wear No. Their uniforms in this series are an alteration of the uniforms seen since they no longer wear ID cards on the right breast pocket, and appear to lack the logos on the arms. They also wear riot armour for their forearms and shins, and plain black brassards on the left arm. The scientific research department that now serves as the head of UNIT consists of plainclothes civilians. The serial Inferno sees the Third Doctor visit a parallel universe. In this reality, Great Britain is a fascist republic; the Royal Family having been executed for undisclosed reasons at some point. Their rank system uses titles based loosely on that of the British Union of Fascists: Their uniforms consist of contemporary US Army olive green military fatigues for Other Ranks, tan uniforms with black rank slides on the shoulders based on the brown shirts for officers, and black garrison caps with white piping and an RSF cap-badge as head-dress for both. The organisation has full authority to interrogate, court-martial, and formally execute prisoners as they see fit under the "Defence of the Republic Act, ". By the end of the story, most of the members of the RSF are killed when a volcanic cataclysm engulfed Great Britain and left much of their world devastated. Different spin-offs have made varying attempts to be consistent with other stories. Broadsword agents wore plain clothes and were "hand-picked to offer us lateral and non-military solutions, backed up by SAS training and sheer common sense". The story concerns a UNIT that never had the Third Doctor working for it, with many different outcomes; Terror of the Autons resulted in "the Plastic Purges", Mike Yates died on a time-travel mission to destroy the Silurians, and so on. The Longest Night The Centenarian [72] before ending in Short Trips: Produced by Reeltime Pictures, this was the first independently made Doctor Who spin-off film and was followed by many others[clarification needed] over the next 20 years. T forces led by Sargent Benton can be seen loading a unconscious Juggernaut into a lorry while Benton receives a message. Due to the objections by the United Nations as noted above, the letters "UN" are no longer expanded to "United Nations" on the website. UNIT dating[edit] The original "series presents conflicting evidence about when the stories featuring UNIT are meant to take place, and there has been much confusion and continuing fan debate on this subject. Initially the production team intended for the UNIT stories to take place in the near future.

Seventies or eighties depending on the dating protocol".
