The words are respectively equivalent to fuck and shit and are used as both interjections and nouns in the series. In the episode "Suns and Lovers", for example, Aeryn Sun says "frell me dead! Parke Godwin opines that excessive profanity, as a part of naturalistic dialogue, "dulls much modern fiction and too many films" and states it to be a pitfall for novice writers, or for writers who never grow up, to fall into. He states that it is a "lazy copout that no longer frightens horses in the street, merely annoys and ultimately bores an intelligent reader". He advises writers that "less is more", and that if it really is the right thing for a character to be salty, it should be made clear to the reader why, observing as an example that in his science fiction novel Limbo Search the profanity used by character Janice Tyne is a symptom of her fear and tension, caused by being burned out at age 27 and afraid of the future. She compares the racial hatred associated with the use of nigger an utterance of which she states to have preceded and accompanied "every lynching of a black person in America" to the racial hatred of the Cylons, by the humans, that the use of such phrases as frakking toasters indicates in the series. She also observes that several of the characters, including Gaius Baltar, are frakking toaster lovers. New Frontier novels by Peter David, the principal protagonist, Captain Mackenzie Calhoun, frequently utters the word grozit, a curse from his home world of Xenex. It is understood to be the equivalent to shit. The video game Star Wars: Republic Commando also used fierfek, the expletive popular in the Star Wars franchise. Fictional profanities[ edit ] Profanity in SF also encompasses the idea of things that alien cultures might find profane, and the notion that what non-humans and humans find to be profane may differ markedly. Card observes that human profanity encompasses words dealing with sexual intercourse and states that that tells one something about human beings. He proceeds to suggest that what aliens might find to be profane can be a useful tool for suggesting the alienness of a culture. The first example of this that he gives are alien cultures that have no trouble with words about sexual intercourse, but that find words to do with eating to be profane. Enterprise made use of this concept in the episode "Vox Sola". In other contexts[ edit ] As mentioned above, shazbot briefly enjoyed popular usage outside of its television show. Originally spelled frack, it along with felgercarb were coined by writer Glen A. Larson for the Battlestar Galactica, for much the same reasons that frell and dren were coined for Farscape: Other common insults are goit and gimboid. For more detail, see pages et seq.

Because the hired hands “agents, editors, conference presenters, visiting authors, etc. Seem like a frivolous concern, compared to the weightier issues of pitching? If you want to make friends quickly, throw a few extra pens and paper into your bag, for handing around to total strangers less prepared than you. Even if you have no interest in making friends and influencing anyone other than an agent or editor at a conference, consider being the friendly neighborhood pen supplier. They are inexpensive, easily portable, and a small price to pay for making the acquaintance of some kind souls who will buy your books someday. Who is going to understand better what a triumph that is “or be more likely to understand that the best way to support a writer is to buy her books? As, alas, one almost invariably does now at literary conferences. I already signed up for those events, as well as my pitch appointments. Details have been known to fall through the cracks occasionally. If you registered electronically, make sure to bring a hard copy of the confirmation. And if everything goes perfectly when you check in, please remember to thank the volunteer who helped you. As my grandmother used to say: And as I said only moments ago, who do you think is going to buy your book? You may well want to be a speaker at this conference someday; be charming. Again, I hate to be the one to break it to you, but it is not at all unheard-of for a hotel hosting a conference to over-book. This is not an occasion for a flimsy purse. Think grad student backpack, not clutch bag. This is usually the case, incidentally, even if the author in question is a household name. So if you are looking for an excuse to walk up to a world-famous author and burble how much you love her writing, look no farther than this bookstore. You might just end up with a marvelous literary friend. Which is one of the reasons you signed up to go to a conference in the first place, right? Again, though, use discretion. No one likes to be accosted with a pen and a hardback in the bathroom, or while deep in conversation with a friend one has not seen for seven years. And if an author with a traditional publisher has shown up with her own copies, purloined from the sometimes generous stash of promotional copies publishers often provide authors because the expected copies did not show up on time for the conference yes, it happens, the sales may not count toward official sales totals. You should, if the book sounds interesting. An author with a strong preference will be only too glad to steer you in the right direction. The author may well elect to carry around half a dozen copies in his shoulder bag, just in case an eager reader turns up when the bookstore is closed. Oh, did I forget to tell you to sit down before I mentioned that? So does the market. But blurbs tend to get reused from year to year. Yes, even if an agent is declaring her undying love for semi-explicit love scenes in science fiction, and you happen to write futuristic Westerns. And who do you think is going to buy“oh, you know the tune by now. That way, I can remember who was who by who was sitting where. I also note a few physical characteristics for each, along with their expressed preferences in books. Why should I care what they look like and where they were sitting? Well, these fora are typically scheduled at the very beginning of the first full day of the conference “a very, very long day. Or to be sure that the redhead to whom they were just introduced in the bar was the agent with the romantic tastes in science fiction “or the one who said she was interested primarily in historical fiction about nuns. Being able to whip out those diagrams for a surreptitious last-minute check can be very helpful. On my diagrams, the author-consumers tend to be depicted with horns, pitchfork, and tail. I always, always, ALWAYS advise writers to bring a big bottle of water to a conference “even to ones where the organizers tend to be very good about keeping water available. A screw-top bottle in your bag can save both spillage and inconvenience to your neighbors. Personally, I prefer to meet people when my lenses are not opaque with grime. I also prefer for my voice to be audible when I speak, rather than rasping. If your eyes dry out easily, consider wearing your glasses instead. You want to be at your best. Lip balm can be helpful in this respect, too. Conferences and hotels, like airports, see a lot of traffic, so the week leading up to the conference is most emphatically the time to skip the vitamins. I go one step further: To stave off feeling woozy during a pitch meeting, here are some tips: Not just every so often, but on a regular basis. You might even consider taking it up habitually. People who do tend to fall over. Even though everyone else will be doing so with enthusiasm. You will want your perceptions sharp, not wired or dulled. A glimpse of blue sky can provide a lot of perspective. Do it for the karma. And who do you think is going to buy your books in years to come? This is a time to be very good to yourself. A conference should not be an endurance test. When I ran the Pitch Practicing Palace a safe space for those new to the game to run their pitches by agented writers before trying them out on an agent or editor, to weed out potential problems, I used to keep a bowl of candy on hand, simply because so few pitchers had remembered to feed themselves. If you are anticipating doing a lot of hallway pitching, or dislike the type of rubber chicken and reheated pasta that tends to turn up on conference buffets, you might want to conceal a few munchies in your bag, to keep yourself fueled up. I like to toss a couple of oranges into my conference kit: Even people who hate oranges may ask for a section. The generous person with the tin of Altoids also tends to be rather popular in the waiting area near the pitching appointments. Since you will most likely be sitting on comfortless chairs for many, many hours over the course of the conference, you might want to bring a small pillow, either to sit upon or for back support. Those metal chairs can be brutal. You should have heard the public rejoicing. I used to advise my university students to wear their strangest underwear on final exam day, for that reason — it allowed them to know something that no one else in the room knew. So I say from experience: Anything will do, as long as it is special to you. So far, my advice has been concerned with your comfort and welfare. A business card, for instance, or comparably sized sheets from your home printer. I mention this now, so you may prepare in advance. Having to scabble around in your tote bag for a stray scrap of paper upon which to inscribe your vitals every time you meet someone nice gets old fast. Heck, all of those books you buy might just be deductible as market research. Seriously, it is worth your while to have some inexpensive business cards made, to print some up at home, or to ask Santa to bring you some professional-looking jobs for Christmas. Even if the agent of your dreams just ends up using your card as a bookmark, she will see your name again. Second, unless you make a point of sitting by yourself in a corner for the entire conference, you are probably going to meet other writers that you like. It works the other way, too, of course. The easier you make it for those nice writers to contact you, the more likely they are to remain in contact. Why would I waste my time chatting up other aspiring writers, who are ostensibly there for precisely the same reason? It requires less energy to keep to yourself, true, but it is a tad elitist, not to say short-sighted: The more writer friends you have, the easier it is to learn from experience. What better source for finding out which agents are really nice to writers, and which are not? And who do you think is going to come to your book signings five years from now, if not that sweet writer with whom you chatted about romantica at lunch? Obviously, if you can swing a one-on-one with the keynote speaker, go for it. You said exactly what I needed to hear right now. But try not to let star-gazing distract you from interacting with the less well-known authors teaching the classes — who are there to help you, after all — or the writer sitting next to you in class. Remember those magic first hundred words? Someday, some of your fellow conference attendees are going to be bigwigs themselves. And even if this were not true but it is, writing is an isolating business. For every hour that even the most commercially successful writer spends interacting with others in the business, she spends hundreds alone, typing away. The more friends you can make who will understand your emotional ups and downs as you work through scenes in a novel, or query agents, or gnaw your fingernails down to the knuckle, waiting for an editor to decide whether to buy your book, the better. Not all of us are lucky enough to live and work with people who appreciate the necessity of revising a sentence for the sixth time. So stuff some business cards into your conference bag. Why five pages, specifically? Well, not all agents will want to see them, but many, when they are seriously taken with a pitch, will ask to see a few pages on the spot, to see if the writing is good enough to justify the serious time commitment of reading the whole book. Especially if you had the foresight to carry them in a folder, so they would not wrinkle, and to print them on lb or better bright white paper. You will never miss an opportunity by offering to mail or e-mail it instead.
