Telephone Game The Telephone game illustrates how quickly a message can be altered even when passed from person to person in a relatively short line. In the real world word, the Telephone game often goes by a different name: Gossip.

The bottom line is that in reality, Teresa was the one who brought up the past in every situation we discussed that night at my house. I just held her accountable for her own actions in each situation. Teresa never seems to take accountability for her own actions. I may hit below the belt sometimes, but at least I hit with the truth. When you challenge me, I will challenge you back. Teresa and I share the same zodiac sign --Taurus. Right now, our horns are locked. About my situation with Joe Gorga, I explained most of that in my last blog too. I never felt I needed to go through Melissa to talk to Joe. I felt we were all close enough friends by now that I could pick up the phone to speak to him if I needed to clear something up that he was involved in. It had nothing to do with Melissa. The telephone game never works. When I have an issue with someone, I like to go right to the source. I guess by lying, Teresa was just looking to cause problems between her brother and me. She knew Joe and I were friends, but I guess she always tried to sway my opinion of Melissa and Joe, even before I even met them. One thing I noticed is that I really do talk with my hands a lot! I was so thrilled for her to be able to do these renovations. It may be the same old house where all her old memories some painful were lingering, but this home makeover was a chance to make it feel new again. It was giving her a new sanctuary to call her own where she could start creating new memories! They have a great family unit. Everyone welcome Pete to our family! What a great guy! We all adore him, and he comes from such a great family. Pete had approached Chris and I when he joined us at Thanksgiving and asked if we would be opposed to him marrying Ashlee one day. Of course we said that it was up to them, but we loved him like a son. We would not object. They were always the best of friends. When Ashlee took Pete over Christmas to go meet her father in Texas for the first time, he had asked him the same question. I thought that was very old school and very respectful. I just had no idea he was thinking about asking her so soon! I was SO excited! Fast forward to our dinner you saw on this episode. Pete and Ashlee were discussing moving in together. Chris and I agreed that was a big commitment and that it would most likely lead to marriage! Chris and I had been engaged for over a year and a half before I moved my life and Ashlee across the country to New Jersey to live with Chris for the first time. We knew that with our engagement and my moving across the country that it meant a commitment of marriage was coming. We were both excited and anxious to start a family right away! Chris is one of 11 children, and I was one of three. We both discussed wanting to have six kids together! I guess God already had a plan for us. I was blessed with my daughter and my two boys Chris gave me. I feel very happy, satisfied and grateful. When Pete told me at dinner that he was ready to go buy Ashlee an engagement ring, I think I went numb for a second I was thrilled for them and excited for their future. I was honored that he wanted me to go with him to pick out rings. I wanted to go, but I wanted the choice to come from him. They could always upgrade later as the years go on if they felt they wanted to do that. I just let Pete do his thing, and I just observed. I knew Ashlee would be thrilled! I was thrilled for the both of them. Ashlee finally found her special someone! Stay tuned next week while we all go to the Crystal Springs Resort for a girls spa getaway weekend. I am grateful for you!

3: A Real Life Game Of Telephone - Funny Quotes & True Stories

The game of telephone is a classic ice breaker and party game. It's easy to set up and a lot of fun to play. You and your friends will try to pick a word or phrase, "pass it on" by whispering it to someone next to you, and have fun seeing how much it changed during the game.

Instead of giving up and turning on the computer or the television, call a friend and play a game over the phone. With a little adjusting, many games you already know can be played by people in two different places. Here are a few ideas to get you started.

Chess Each player needs chess pieces and a chess board or diagram of a board with columns labeled A to H left to right and rows labeled 1 to 8 bottom to top. The person playing black should rotate the board degrees. Set up the game. When it is your turn, identify the location, using letter and number, of the piece you are moving and the place you are moving it. Your partner should update his board with your move before taking a turn.

Checkers Label a board as described in the chess section above. Lay out checkers on both ends. Play the game, giving the location of the checker you are moving and each square you are moving it to. If you jump over pieces, give their locations, too.

Twenty Questions One person thinks of something in one of these categories: The other person asks up to twenty questions to guess what it is. When you guess the right answer or ask all twenty questions, switch roles.

Add a Word One person says a word. The other person adds a word to start building a sentence. Go back and forth one word at a time until you reach the end of the sentence. The object is to make the sentence last as long as possible. Either player can decide when the sentence is complete.

Make Up a Story One person starts a story, telling a few sentences. Then she passes it to the other person, who adds a few more sentences. Switch back and forth until you agree that the story is over.

Guess by Letter Hangman Each person needs a piece of paper and pen or pencil. One person thinks of a word or phrase, writes it, and tells the other how many words there are and how many letters in each word. The other person draws short lines to represent the letters in the word or phrase. He suggests one letter at a time. If the letter appears, the other person tells each place it falls, and the person guessing fills in the blanks. When he correctly guesses the word or phrase, or when all wrong letter guesses have been used, play switches. Allow twelve wrong letter guesses. For a harder game, reduce the number.

Filed under - Call Centre Management , Games , Incentives , Motivation , Staffing Games can be a great way to motivate advisors, so we asked some experts and our readers to suggest a few of the best for call centre teams. But these suggestions come with a warning. While incentives, both for teams and individuals, can significantly improve performance, they need to be carefully deployed. Make a tactical decision as to when to run an incentive, perhaps when employee engagement is low, and you will see immediate results. Here are seven ideas for motivational games in the contact centre, as well as a few more ideas that will help when training future advisors. Follow the link for more: Knockout Healthy competition which pits advisors against one another can be good for both motivation and performance. According to Steve, one of our readers, Knockout is the perfect game for doing so. The number of boxes needed is based on the size of your crew and how long you want the game to last. People find it really engaging; it ignites competitiveness, builds comradeship and helps the team to bond. Staff Incentive Schemes That Work 4. The premise is the same as the traditional board game, but it is up to the advisor to win a throw of the dice. Advisors can do so if a customer leaves positive feedback on the IVR survey that they are asked to complete once the customerâ€™s advisor interaction has concluded. The survey asks the caller to score the amount of effort it took them to complete their interaction, on a scale of nine, the lowest possible amount of effort, to one, the highest. If given a nine, the advisor gets to roll the dice and continue to move up or down the board. The board that HomeServe use in their contact centre is pictured below. This improves individual motivation, while sparking healthy competition between advisors who are part of the same team. This is a great example of how motivational games can be used to improve certain metric scores, as in this case HomeServe used Snakes and Ladders as a method of reducing their Customer Effort Score CES. To find out how to create a CES, read our article: How to Calculate Customer Effort 6. Call Centre Jenga This one is a bit more unconventional, but it is often the case that the more creative the call centre gets with these games, the more interest is generated. Jennifer plays Jenga in her contact centre where advisors make appointments and are given a turn after each appointment is set. But a different function like making a sale or achieving good feedback could be used instead. The person with the most points at the end of the day wins the prize. If they knock down the Jenga tower, then they get 30 points deducted from their score. Chase the Envelope This game differs from the others as it contains a bit of mystery, which causes intrigue and excitement that can really boost the working atmosphere. For more examples, read our article: And one advantage of this game is that the participants need to review the session fully in order to develop questions for the other team, as well as being tested themselves. These can be as easy or as difficult as they like. They should keep these questions secret from the other team for the time being. Each team must take it in turns to pose a question to the other team. If the team get the answer right, then it is their turn to ask a question. The Lone Assassin Sometimes there is nothing better than a cheesy game to bring new recruits together, and the lone assassin is ideal for these situations. But it is advisable to make an extra rule that nobody can be assassinated during the session times or other times you do not want to be disturbed. The Team Bus This game provides an interesting method of demonstrating and developing the core skills needed for a contact centre team, i. Give one example and then let them go. The Jelly Baby Tree It is important when training new recruits to encourage discussion, so that future members of the contact centre team can bond and share their questions and concerns. Passing Balls When the training has turned a little flat, motivational games can help to give a quick burst of energy, and this game, according to Tony, one of our readers, is perfect for doing so. As a team, they must get the time down to complete the rotation as fast as possible. Our call centre got down to just over one second. Please leave your ideas in an email to Call Centre Helper.

5: Jacqueline Laurita: The Telephone Game Never Works | The Real Housewives of New Jersey Blog

The Real Housewives of New Jersey Jacqueline Helps Ashlee's Boyfriend Pick an Engagement Ring Jacqueline Laurita is one step closer to becoming a mother of the bride.

You can call me "Jack". I reckon the time to tell my story has come. Originally, for my first two-and-a-half years of high school, I attended a school in the deep Southern part of America, close to the Gulf. We had all kinds of ghost stories growing up and if there was one lesson our super-conservative parents taught us, it was this: Now, I was really unpopular at my high school in the South. My first two years of high school were a real pain because I was a big dork and everyone made fun of me. I started to attend a little Catholic high school with no more than around students. It was at this time that I finally started to fit in and make friends. Maybe I could even get a cute girlfriend if I was careful. I started to meet people at the school. At a school that small, you end up knowing everyone in your class. My first day I made a new friend named Sam and at lunch I opted to sit with him and his friends. He told me all about the other kids at the school - who was most popular, who the jocks were, so on and so forth. He introduced me to his friends, too: Some of the guys said she could be a bitch, but she seemed cool enough. She was into gaming and never messed with any of us. Sam told me all kinds of stories about her, like how she used to make snacks for guys at the school but then sprinkle Viagra all over them or pour laxatives into them so that anyone who ate it would suffer the brunt of her painful and arguably cruel joke. I just chuckled to myself and politely refused whenever she offered me anything. His real name was Jason, but everyone always called him "Rottenbacher" or "the Kraut" because he was a hardcore Nazi. He was an outcast and a loner. No one wanted to be associated with him. Furthermore, on Halloween and on school costume "event" days when he knew he could get away with it, Rottenbacher always wore an entire replica of an SS uniform like the Gestapo wear, with the black hat and the long boots. He was a mean and angsty son-of-a-bitch. Sam told me that somebody once saw him tightening a barbed Cilice in the locker room like the ones the Catholic priests wear to punish themselves for their sins. It was kind of strange for a hardcore Hitler lover like Rottenbacher, but it was high school and none of us preferred to think too much about stuff like that. If you asked anyone exactly what happened, no one could tell you a damn thing. They always just said it was because she played the "cell phone game. Stephanie the cute, mischievous Asian. Rottenbacher the self-torturing Nazi. The cell phone game. All of these people and events were about to come together to drag me into something in which I wanted no part. Anyway, the last half of Junior year came and went, and the long summer passed us all by in what seemed like a heartbeat; it was finally time to begin our last year of high school. Everyone was back for the new school year, pumped to start the laziest and most fun year of our high school lives. Even Rottenbacher, still limping around the school in that barbed Cilice, still spouting his Nazi garbage every time someone decided to mess with him. The year started out eerily quiet. Word was that two more "cell phone game" related disappearances had happened over the summer to one boy and one girl from another high school and that the police were investigating a possible serial killer. According to the paper, the only common link the police had found was that every person who disappeared had received a text message that read, "Welcome to the game. It was this year when I finally started to open up more as a person. I had made a good circle of friends who I trusted and I felt more calm about being myself at this point. Gradually, I started to fit in more and more and pretty soon I was pretty popular in certain circles. Stephanie liked to hang around with me more and more because of how funny she thought my jokes were. Before long, one day - which I still remember as one of the happiest of my life - she came to me in the middle of campus after school and looked up at me with this beautiful Asian eyes and that long, black hair and a smile to die for. She asked me right then, "Jack, will you go out with me? I finally had a girlfriend. I still remember that as one of the happiest days of my entire life, if not THE happiest. We went on dates, we hung out after school, and she even started to eat lunch with Sam, Jim, Vogelman, and I every day. It was one day at lunch when she was sitting with us, when she mentioned that while sleeping over with her friends one night, they had stayed up late with some girls from another high school talking about the cell phone game. She said that these girls knew all about the rules of the game and that they had explained it all to her in great detail. Supposedly, you can join the game at any time by sending a text message at midnight to the right phone number. The text message was supposed to say, "I wish for the power to curse. Stephanie went on to talk about the game. We all listened attentively to what she was saying. She told us that once someone was in the game, they were in danger. Within two weeks, they had to complete one of a number of different tasks or else they would be dragged away in the night. I stopped her right there. She said that in order to protect oneself from being dragged away, you could do one of two things: The first was to find a special protective item. The item could be anything. You never knew what it was going to be, but it seemed that whatever the item was, it would make the bearer suffer in some way. This was considered a small price to pay in return for protection for as long as you wore the item. The second way was to bring someone else into the game. If someone received the text message from someone else who was in the game, then that meant that this person was now in the game, too, and subject to all of the same rules and consequences of the game. The catch about the second was this: While the protective item, if found, could protect you indefinitely so long as you kept it with you, bringing someone else into the game would only buy you a temporary grace period. Then, only one week. Eventually the grace period would get shorter and shorter until you barely bought yourself any time at all by bringing someone else into the game. By that time, you needed to have found your protective item. And imagine how cool that would be to be able to curse anyone who messed with you by bringing them into the game! You could get rid of anyone and no one would ever know. She almost sounded intoxicated at the thought of it. Truth be told, it scared me a little. What if you got involved in it and then it all turned out to be true? What would I do if something happened to you? Are you happy now? But, to be honest, I always thought it was kind of cute and just accepted it as one of her quirks. But this time it was serious. So, a few days later, when she came back and told us that she had joined the cell phone game, I was pissed. A text message was open on the screen which read, "Welcome to the game. I got it just after I sent the text at midnight, just like the girls said. I was speechless and scared stiff. But Stephanie, if this is real then that makes you as good as a murderer! You cursed Rebecca and now she could die because of you! A couple of weeks passed and nothing happened. At lunchtime, Stephanie was sitting around with us as usual when the assistant principal came to talk to us all with a megaphone. If any of you know anything about this, please come and talk to me after school. I was very afraid for her. I was very afraid for what she might do. I chased after her. What are you doing? Who are you going to curse? No one deserves this. Let me help you! We can find a protective object for you together! Her text outbox had a message which read, "Welcome to the game. I started to weep. I grabbed onto her as tightly as I could. None of this is right. We held each other there for nearly an hour like that. I still remember it like it was yesterday.
