Lewis did not reach France until November , shortly after he turned eighteen, and he undoubtedly knew by then that war was not the glorious, honorable thing depicted in the classical poetry he so loved.

Massawepie is the largest boreal peat land in the state, and it offers great habitat not only for boreal bird species such as gray jays and breeding olive-sided flycatchers, but its complexity of habitats make it great for many species which breed in deciduous and coniferous forests as well. Unfortunately, our trip fell on an unseasonably cold, wet day, and we were all consistently chilled and dripping. But our group of participants was game to explore without complaint, and we enjoyed a great day out. We started our day by exploring the deciduous forest along the windy dirt road which leads to the access for the bog. Even though fewer birds were singing due to the rain, we found a nice mixed feeding flock at the boat launch on Massawepie Lake which included northern parula, blackburnian warbler, black-throated green warbler, pine warbler, black-capped chickadee, and golden-crowned kinglet. We carpoled down the road to the old railroad bed which cuts across the bog itself, but started with a short walk to a small stream crossing where several chestnut-sided warblers were singing and gave us nice looks. Yellow-rumped warblers were also scattered in the trees along the stream “as they were elsewhere during our day” and a pileated woodpecker flew low above the trees across the stream opening. The young deciduous forest around the parking area was productive as well with good numbers of American redstarts, a black-throated blue warbler, red-eyed vireos, and chestnut-sided warblers in the brushy edges of the forest. Perhaps our biggest highlight of the day was a cooperative mourning warbler which sat perched and sang for everyone to see “even as the rain let up for a spell to give us a break. Mourning warblers are one of my favorite warbler species, and they can often be difficult to spot in their preferred brushy habitat. We walked out on the railroad bed where the cold wind and rain waxed and waned, and at times made birding difficult. There were many palm warblers however, and several of them hung out along the trail for everyone in the group to see. Nashville and magnolia warblers “usually common in the conifer forests which border the bog” were largely quiet and we only heard a couple distant birds. But the trail still held white-throated and song sparrows, and we eventually reached the bridge about a mile out the railroad bed where we turned around. The bridge is often a good place to find a variety of bird species, and this time was no different. A swamp sparrow sang from the marshy border of the stream, and we saw a beautiful male magnolia warbler in the thicket along the trail. There we also found a very wet purple finch sitting in a tree along the stream looking rather disheveled as it sat in the open in the cold rain. Perhaps it was a reminder of our own plight, and we turned for some dry clothes. After retracing our steps and stopping at a few points as we drove out, we returned to the parking area where I hooted for barred owl and elicited a response from a variety of birds including a blue-headed vireo. Despite the cold and wet conditions, we found about 40 species of birds, including 14 species of warblers “not at all bad for a chilly, wet day in May.

Jackboy A new series of pokemon occurring in new region which is filled with new pokemon and new characters. Sorry it took long to update, I was busy with school and all that. I hope you like this chapter. Please review, any comments, criticism, etc. Bye" said a slightly bewildered Pete. Also Pete found it rather strange that his mom was busy because usually she would always have time for him and his stories. He wondered if something was wrong or if his mom was feeling sick or something. I hope everything is alright You could tell his mind was on something else. Sandy picked this up and asked, "Is everything ok? Do you have a map? How long a trip is it from here to Mire City, do you think? Mime could go with you? The two then set off to Mire City. You two seem so close! When he died, about two years ago, he gave Mr. You could tell it was looking for a battle. Pete pulled out his pokedex: It looks very similar to a Chimchar except it is blue in color and its tail lacks a flame. In fact Hydreep and Chimchar look so much in common, some Pokemon scientists think that they are related and wonder if a grass monkey pokemon exists. Mime block it with barrier! The water gun was then reflected away. Mime then did something which Sandy could only recognize as confusion. After three shakes the ball stays still. Josh called me and told me that you beat him. I have also heard that you were going to battle the Forruvia gym leader, Julia, how did that turn out? Pete then put the phone on speaker phone so Sandy could hear. Now we all know one way pokemon reproduce is through eggs, but the strange thing is, the only two pokemon in the field where the egg was found were a Chimchar and a Hydreep. So we both are wondering if the pokemon in that egg is a Hydreep or a Chimchar, and maybe, from this, we can understand more about Pokemon in general. Unfortunately we are both too busy to hatch it, so I was wondering if you could pick it up on your way to Mire City and take it with you. Do you think it is possible for that grass-monkey pokemon to be in that egg? They believe that some pokemon possess a gene that decides what type the pokemon would be. However, I, as well as many other scientist believe that pokemon have little or no genes because usually all of a certain pokemon are the same height, color weight, etc. By now the two had been walking for about two hours and are only one hour away for Mire City. The two then decided to rest for a bit because they were a little tired from walking for the last two hours. After their thirty minute rest the two trainers then set out for the last hour of their trek. Sandy still not over the thrill of possibly discovering a new pokemon spoke, "Can you imagine what it would be like? To discover a new pokemon? How amazing would that be? People from the news and magazines would be all over us! How awesome would it be? Onaclov and I would have to train a lot, and the more training we get, the better we are as a team. Let us curse God most High. Lewis had written these lines, I would not have believed you that the academic, apologist, and novelist that I knew and loved was capable of such anger and despair. I learned so much about what made WWI unique " a horror among horrors. At any moment, soldiers in the front lines could be bombed with shells or gassed with toxic fumes. But his atheism did not survive the war. He began to believe that the material world was in itself evil, and that man possessed a spirit; the best and most enlightened men could cope by denying the physical world altogether for the illusion it was. It was special to share the experience with my father, getting to observe as he reached into his own heart to pull out some of the grief that lived there. One of the first lessons I learned in the two weeks was that hurt is so much better understood when someone else helps you unpack and explore it. We thought we were coming to France to discuss history, but I, for one, learned more about the human condition. In my final entry I summarized what I learned in these words: This war caused unprecedented psychological trauma, national grief, and a pervading sense of betrayal and futility for those personally touched by its horrors. We tasted the betrayal and futility, too. We may choose anger and questions, or callous rejection. Yet in both choices, a wrestling match is required: I say we ought to dare to be angry. Dare to raise our voices to our Maker. Lewis, in all his rage and self-proclaimed atheism, did so. I say this not to encourage bitterness or blasphemy towards God " quite the opposite. Who do we believe our God is, anyway? I believe He can handle any question thrown His way. Let us continue to question " so long as we refuse to let resignation be an option. A dear and now-deceased high school mentor of mine used the story of Moses and the burning bush in Exodus 3 and 4 to illustrate how God responds to our questions and doubts. He ends the dialogue. His will is set. It is we who are changed in the questioning. And I believe that, sometimes, pain is the only thing that brings us to those questions in the first place. Perhaps this is intentional. It must be hope. What is grief, anyway? This, I think, is grief. It is knowing just how dreadfully wrong something is " be it a death, the loss of a friendship, a divorce, abuse, an illness " and mourning this wrongness. But I have definitely grown in my certainty that there is one. That He is one. The way he has allowed it to become. I rarely come away from conversations with Him unamazed " and never unchanged. You are yourself the answer. Before your face questions die away. What other answer would suffice?
