Investigations into his military service led to the Killian documents controversy. Lockhart subsequently stated he was "wary" of contact with Mapes at this stage, because if the story were true, his involvement might undermine its credibility, and if it were false, "he did not want to be associated with it. The documents included the following: An order directing Bush to submit to a physical examination. Pierce, Emily Will, and Linda James, to determine the validity of the memos. Among other issues covered in his interview with Rather and Mapes, Strong was asked if he thought the documents were genuine. Strong stated, "they are compatible with the way business was done at the time. They are compatible with the man that I remember Jerry Killian being. General Hodges later asserted to the investigatory panel that he told Mapes that Killian had never, to his knowledge, ordered anyone to take a physical and that he had never been pressured regarding Lieutenant Bush, as the documents alleged. Will requested other documents to use for comparison. Only one of the two documents provided to Pierce had a signature. James Pierce wrote, "the balance of the Jerry B. Killian signatures appearing on the photocopied questioned documents are consistent and in basic agreement," and stated that based on what he knew, "the documents in question are authentic. On September 6, Matley was interviewed by Rather and Mapes and was provided with the other four documents obtained from CBS he would prove to be the only reviewer to see these documents prior to the segment. Matley told Rather "he could not authenticate the documents due to the fact that they were poor quality copies. Associate producer Yvonne Miller left him a voicemail on September 7; he returned the call at 11 am on September 8 but was told they "did not need him anymore. The segment used the sound bite of Strong saying the documents were compatible with how business was done but did not include a disclaimer that Strong was told to assume the documents were authentic. MacDougald, an Atlanta attorney who had worked for conservative groups such as the Federalist Society and the Southeastern Legal Foundation, and who had helped draft the petition to the Arkansas Supreme Court for the disbarment of President Bill Clinton. This should be pursued aggressively. However, the authenticity of the memos was not part of the story carried by major news outlets on that day. Lines said that meant she could testify in court that, beyond a reasonable doubt, her opinion was that the memos were written on a computer. Walter "Buck" Staudt was honorably discharged on March 1, , while the memo cited by CBS as showing that Staudt was interfering with evaluations of Bush was dated August 18, Rather did not report that Matley had referred to them as "poor material", that he had only opined about the signatures or that he had specifically not authenticated the documents. So far, there is none. I believe that the witnesses and the documents are authentic. As the operator types the copy a second time, the spaces are added automatically. Rather instead presented the views of Bill Glennon and Richard Katz. By September 15, Emily Will was publicly stating that she had told CBS that she had doubts about both the production of the memos and the handwriting prior to the segment. I could only verify that the signatures came from the same source," Matley said. But at the same time, there was nothing to tell me that they were not authentic. Dan Rather prefaced the segment on the recorded interview by stating "She told us she believes what the documents actually say is, exactly, as we reported. Press Secretary Scott McClellan stated that the memos had been provided to them by CBS in the days prior to the report and that, "We had every reason to believe that they were authentic at that time. CBS states that use of the documents was a mistake[edit] As a growing number of independent document examiners and competing news outlets reported their findings about the documents, CBS News stopped defending the documents and began to report on the problems with their story. We should not have used them. That was a mistake, which we deeply regret. It is obviously against CBS News standards and those of every other reputable news organization to be associated with any political agenda. Soon after, CBS established a review panel "to help determine what errors occurred in the preparation of the report and what actions need to be taken. Bush, and Louis Boccardi , retired president and chief executive officer and former executive editor of the Associated Press , made up the two-person review board. Rigler, to gather further information about the story. The most serious defects in the reporting and production of the September 8 Segment were: Once questions were raised about the September 8 Segment, the reporting thereafter was mishandled and compounded the damage done. Among the more egregious shortcomings during the Aftermath were: Tytell had been contacted by 60 Minutes producers prior to the broadcast, and had informed associate producer Yvonne Miller and executive producer Josh Howard on September 10 that he believed the documents were forgeries. The Panel report stated, "The Panel met with Peter Tytell, and found his analysis sound in terms of why he thought the documents were not authentic. The Panel reaches no conclusion as to whether Tytell was correct in all respects. Murphy and West resigned on February 25, , [] and after settling a legal dispute regarding his level of responsibility for the segment, Josh Howard resigned on March 25, . This segment was replaced with the Killian documents segment. CBS further postponed airing the Iraq segment until after the election due to the controversy over the Killian documents. It was cancelled in due to low ratings. Mapes stated that the documents have never been proved to be forgeries. Ross expressed the view that the responsibility is on the reporter to verify their authenticity. In response, CBS spokesman Kevin Tedesco told the Associated Press , "CBS News stands by the report the independent panel issued on this matter and to this day, no one has been able to authenticate the documents in question. Killian documents authenticity issues No generally recognized document experts have positively authenticated the memos. Since CBS used only faxed and photocopied duplicates, authentication to professional standards is impossible, regardless of the provenance of the originals. Document experts have challenged the authenticity of the documents as photocopies of valid originals on a variety of grounds ranging from anachronisms of their typography, their quick reproducibility using modern technology, and to errors in their content and style. Accusations of bias[edit] Some critics of CBS and Dan Rather argued that by proceeding with the story when the documents had not been authenticated, CBS was exhibiting liberal bias and attempting to influence the outcome of the U. Freelance journalist Michael Smith had emailed Mapes, asking, "What if there was a person who might have some information that could possibly change the momentum of an election but we needed to get an ASAP book deal to help get us the information? McAuliffe told reporters on September 10, "I can tell you that nobody at the Democratic National Committee or groups associated with us were involved in any way with these documents," he said. That had the effect of taking the whole issue away. I believe in bank shots, but that one was too big a risk.

A beautiful meditation on the nature of those less fortunate, The Scandal of Service reflects on what Jesus did at the Last Supper when he laid his outer clothing aside and washed and dried the feet of his disciples. Vanier pursues the connection of this gesture of humility and service to Jesus.

The Massachusetts Attorney General Maura Healey announced that the state would be launching an investigation. The Democratic senator Mark Warner said the harvesting of data on such a vast scale for political targeting underlined the need for Congress to improve controls. He has proposed an Honest Ads Act to regulate online political advertising the same way as television, radio and print. It may be data about people who are on Facebook that they have gathered themselves, but it is not data that we have provided. It includes emails, invoices, contracts and bank transfers that reveal more than 50 million profiles – mostly belonging to registered US voters – were harvested from the site in one of the largest-ever breaches of Facebook data. Facebook on Friday said that it was also suspending Wylie from accessing the platform while it carried out its investigation, despite his role as a whistleblower. At the time of the data breach, Wylie was a Cambridge Analytica employee, but Facebook described him as working for Eunoia Technologies, a firm he set up on his own after leaving his former employer in late Cambridge Analytica interactive. That legal letter was sent several months after the Guardian first reported the breach and days before it was officially announced that Bannon was taking over as campaign manager for Trump and bringing Cambridge Analytica with him. Facebook did not pursue a response when the letter initially went unanswered for weeks because Wylie was travelling, nor did it follow up with forensic checks on his computers or storage, he said. They waited two years and did absolutely nothing to check that the data was deleted. All they asked me to do was tick a box on a form and post it back. And built models to exploit that and target their inner demons Christopher Wylie A majority of American states have laws requiring notification in some cases of data breach, including California, where Facebook is based. Facebook denies that the harvesting of tens of millions of profiles by GSR and Cambridge Analytica was a data breach. Facebook said it removed the app in and required certification from everyone with copies that the data had been destroyed, although the letter to Wylie did not arrive until the second half of The company is now investigating reports that not all data had been deleted. Kogan, who has previously unreported links to a Russian university and took Russian grants for research, had a licence from Facebook to collect profile data, but it was for research purposes only. Quick guide Show Hide In December , while researching the US presidential election, Carole Cadwalladr came across data analytics company Cambridge Analytica, whose secretive manner and chequered track record belied its bland, academic-sounding name. She found the first indications that Cambridge Analytica might have used data processing methods that breached the Data Protection Act. While chasing the details and ramifications of complex manipulation of both data and funding law, Cadwalladr came under increasing attacks, both online and professionally, from key players. But the growing profile of her reports also gave whistleblowers confidence that they could trust her to not only understand their stories, but retell them clearly for a wide audience. Her network of sources and contacts grew to include not only former employees who regretted their work but academics, lawyers and others concerned about the impact on democracy of tactics employed by Cambridge Analytica and associates. Investigations in the UK remain live. Thank you for your feedback. The Observer has seen a contract dated 4 June , which confirms SCL, an affiliate of Cambridge Analytica, entered into a commercial arrangement with GSR, entirely premised on harvesting and processing Facebook data. It then used the test results and Facebook data to build an algorithm that could analyse individual Facebook profiles and determine personality traits linked to voting behaviour. The algorithm and database together made a powerful political tool. It allowed a campaign to identify possible swing voters and craft messages more likely to resonate. Key players At the time, more than 50 million profiles represented around a third of active North American Facebook users, and nearly a quarter of potential US voters. They did some research for us back in That research proved to be fruitless and so the answer is no. Cambridge Analytica also said none of the data was used in the presidential election.

Inspector General Amy Kurland said DiPietro has helped to shift the culture of the scandal-plagued L&I, from one of rampant corruption to one in which cases of bad actors are few and far between. In return, DiPietro, L&I's integrity officer, got $1,, a certificate, a photo on a wall, and a press release announcing his victory.

How to delete your Facebook account once and for all Facebook, however, says that while Kogan mishandled its data, all the information Kogan got was accessed legally and within its rules. The problem is that Kogan was supposed to hold on to the information himself, not hand it over to Cambridge Analytica or anyone else. Because the information was accessed through normal means, Facebook disputes the characterization of the incident as a breach. Facebook changed that policy in , prohibiting the practice. Wait, so Facebook allows apps to access my data? When you log in to an app using your Facebook account, the developer typically asks for access to information the social network has. Everything else, though, is still fair game. The company has an app review process it puts developers through. You hand your information over to app developers all the time. Think before you click. And read the requests from app developers more carefully. Facebook, by the way, is hoping to stop the next Cambridge Analytica. The company has also revamped its tools to help you identify which apps have access to your data, as well as those to strengthen security of your profile. Facebook also made it easier to download data it has on you. Could this lead to more regulation? Zuckerberg himself said it might. The honeymoon between the tech industry and government is over. After decades of mostly treating tech companies as favored children, legislators and government regulators are increasingly taking a tougher stance against them. Already, this scandal has renewed calls for more regulation. Companies that have settled previous FTC actions, the US agency said, must comply with FTC order provisions imposing privacy and data security requirements. US Federal Trade Commission The consent decree required that Facebook must get users to agree to and must notify them about the social network sharing their data. Facebook earlier told The Washington Post it rejects "any suggestion of violation of the consent decree. A little over three weeks after the Cambridge Analytica news broke, Zuckerberg went to Washington, where over two days he endured 10 hours of questioning by congressional committees. In his first day of testimony, he did score some points. He escaped largely unscathed, having settled into his role as both an explainer of technology and a receiver of the occasional finger-wag. But on day two , things got a little rougher. Some, like New Jersey Rep. Frank Pallone, hammered Zuckerberg on default privacy settings. He said that it was. Kathy Castor and New Mexico Rep. Ben Lujan raised concerns about how much Facebook follows people as they browse the web -- and whether people without accounts on the social media network still get tracked via " shadow profiles. Was this similar to what the Obama campaign did on Facebook? But as Politifact notes, users were willingly giving up that information and knew it was going to a political campaign. After five long days, Zuckerberg broke his silence on March 21 with a nearly 1,word post on his Facebook page. Aggregate IQ denies this connection. Facebook said it instituted the ban out of concern that AggregateIQ may have improperly received Facebook user data as well. Facebook is also planning to restrict how much access developers have to your information , limiting the information it gives apps to your name, photo and email address. All of that will provide comfort to many users, but for others

The scandal of service: Jesus washes our feet. [Jean Vanier] -- A meditation on what Jesus did at the Last Supper when he laid his outer clothing aside and washed and tried his disciples' feet, a task ordinarily performed by the lowly household slave.

October 11, - He could be an Integrity Idol. It operates on a simple premise that could be powerful enough to change the world: What if instead of just putting corrupt officials behind bars, we put honest ones on TV? Someone suggested, half-jokingly, Integrity Idol. He started Accountability Lab to combat those horrifying statistics. And it has to be a ground-up approach. Helping tenants register to vote Ideas We Should Steal They launched the program in Nepal, and that first year got nominations. A well-respected panel whittled down to five finalists, whom they filmed and interviewed to air on TV and radio all over the country. Through an SMS voting system, tens of thousands of Nepali picked the winner: Gyan Mani, a chief district officer in a poor region of the country, who routed out corruption in among other places the local schools. Six other countries now have their own Integrity Idol: The Idols have become celebrities whom people want to meet and emulate. They have launched a Meet the Idols campaign, sending winners and nominees into schools and universities to spread the idea of ethical behavior in all professions and advocate and educate around issues, like health-care reform and education. In some countries, Glencorse says, Idols are now working with civil-service training programs to develop curricula and mentor new public servants on doing their jobs with integrity. And, they have begun hosting Integrity Summits in each country, bringing together winners and nominees to work together on projects. Glencorse says he is starting to think about how to launch Integrity Idol in the United States, starting with one city at a time. Perhaps we could suggest Philadelphia "the birthplace of America" as the first city to bring back integrity? That apathy leads to the appalling lack of participation in our public life. It causes low voter turnout, a shrug when school buildings are falling down around our children, and a silence when City Council makes decisions, in front of a virtually empty chamber, that affect us all. It is the death knell of democracy. Do you know any public officials who deserve to be idolized for their integrity?

Timeline[edit] George W. He committed to serve until May 26, , with two years on active duty while training to fly and four years on part-time duty. When he graduated, he had fulfilled his two-year active-duty commitment. Killian , commander of the th Fighter Squadron , recommended that Bush be promoted to First Lieutenant , calling him "a dynamic outstanding young officer" who stood out as "a top notch fighter interceptor pilot. Bush is also a good follower with outstanding disciplinary traits and an impeccable military bearing. Bush performed part-time Guard duty as an F pilot through April , logging a total of flight hours. He volunteered his services on several projects, including a political campaign. After April , Bush may have failed to meet the attendance requirements established for members of the Air National Guard. In mid, he failed to meet the Air Force requirement for an annual physical examination for pilots, and lost his authorization to be a pilot. He drilled in Alabama in October and November , and again in January ; what duties he performed are unknown. Bush returned to his home unit in Houston and was paid for his service in April through July ; again, what duties he performed are not documented in any way. Acceptance into the National Guard[edit] During the " period, Presidents Johnson and Nixon decided against calling up National Guard units for service in Vietnam. However, military documents show during the Vietnam War, almost 23, Army and Air Guardsmen were called up for a year of active duty; some 8, were deployed to Vietnam. Presidential campaign, [10] Barnes repeated that he used his political influence to preferentially refer people to the National Guard, including Bush. Bush and his father have stated that they did not ask Adger to intercede and were unaware of any action he may have taken. In addition, Bush had two arrests for college pranks and four traffic offenses before applying for pilot training. In , former and current military pilots said it was uncommon for an applicant to be accepted into pilot school with such a record, though there was no specific score that disqualified a candidate. Retired Major General Paul A. Weaver, a former head of the Air National Guard, said Bush could have just been practicing landing skills. Coding on the logs showed these assignments were subsequently deleted from the official record. Bush did not take this mandatory physical examination in mid As a result of his failure to take his physical, his flight status was suspended by his commander on August 1, , [17] confirmed by Col Bobby Hodges on September 5, , and confirmed again by a National Guard Bureau order on September 29, , which meant he no longer was authorized to fly as a pilot. But regulations require that the physical be performed by an Air Force doctor. According to his released military records, after April Bush never flew again as an Air National Guard pilot. According to the request form, Bush was already in Alabama at work on the Senate campaign of Winton M. Blount , who was a friend of his father. Jimmy Allison, a longtime family friend, helped Bush get the campaign work. Training Category "G" offered no training at all. He would have reported to Lieutenant Colonel William Turnipseed, the base commander, for drills on October 7 and 8, and November 4 and 5 the September drill dates of the unit had already passed. Senator Prescott Bush , died of cancer on October 8, and Bush served as a pallbearer at the funeral in Greenwich, Connecticut. Turnipseed has said that he could not recall whether Bush reported on those occasions. Senate campaign in Alabama, on which Bush worked, ended on November 7, , when Blount lost overwhelmingly. A column in the Birmingham News Alabama reported about people who remembered Bush when he was in Alabama, working for the Blount campaign: Some heard he was serving but never saw for themselves. The review stated that "Lt. Bush has not been observed at this unit during the period of the report. Killian also wrote, "A civilian occupation made it necessary for him to move to Montgomery, Ala. He cleared this base on May 15, and has been performing equivalent training in a non-flying status with the Tac Recon Gp. Professional United Leadership League , the brainchild of John White, a former professional football player and civic leader. That service presumably occurred at his home base, Ellington Air Force Base , in Houston, in contradiction to the information in his performance review. For May , Bush was paid for service on fifteen days: For June, he was paid for five days; for July his last month of drilling for 19 days. However there is nothing in the released military documents that shows that he actually reported for duty on those days, or exactly where, or what duties he performed. Six-year service obligation[edit] On May 27, , Bush signed a six-year obligation. That required him to complete "48 scheduled inactive-duty training periods" each fiscal year typically consisting of four four-hour periods during one weekend each month , plus a minimum of 15 days of Annual Active Duty Training. For Bush, as a pilot, this was typically split into periods of duty of a few days each during the year. The Boston Globe reported in September that "Bush fell well short of meeting his military obligation", citing examples of Bush failing to meet Air National Guard commitments in and If I disassociate from my current Ready Reserve Assignment, it is my responsibility to locate and be assigned to another Reserve Forces unit or mobilization augmentation position. If I fail to do so, I am subject to involuntary order to active duty for up to 24 months under the provisions of AFM , chapter Bush had completed five years, four months, and five days toward his six-year service obligation. On November 21, , he was discharged from the Air Force Reserve, ending his military service. Department of Defense and the U. A Pentagon official said the earlier statement that the records were destroyed was an "inadvertent oversight. Like the records released earlier by the White House, the newly released documents did not indicate that Bush performed any drills, in Alabama or elsewhere, during May through September She said the logs were found among a batch of records sent to St. Louis from Norton Air Force Base in , which were originally thought to contain records of active-duty officers rather than of National Guardsmen such as Bush. They have never [sic] been sitting in an uncontrolled climate," said Lt. Killian documents authenticity issues The "Killian documents" were initially claimed by CBS to have come from the "personal files" of the late Lt. Starting with a Free Republic web posting by Harry MacDougald, a conservative Republican lawyer posting under the blogger name, "Buckhead. Army, rather than U. The man who delivered the copies, Lt. Bill Burkett , a former officer in the Texas Army National Guard and outspoken Bush critic, claimed that he burned the originals. Burkett admitted lying to CBS and USA Today about where he had obtained the papers and eventually expressed doubts of his own about their authenticity. Boccardi to investigate the story and the handling of the Killian memos.

First, those institutions neglecting the basic fundamentals of patient care, risk jeopardizing the quality and safety of care they provide. And second, nothing can have a greater short- and long-term impact on the cost of delivering healthcare services than nurses. For more than 60 years the model of patient care has been changing. Hospital operations--the way work works--generally has fallen short in keeping pace with that change. Technology, protocols, and treatments are just a few of the dramatic shifts in recent years. But in the middle of all that change are nurses. In the middle of all the chaos of ringing bells and flashing lights are nurses. Underneath the hum and buzz of delivering healthcare to patients lie dysfunctional and costly processes, essentially forced onto nurses and their colleagues. This team was responsible for the care of eight to ten patients. Nursing stations were centralized, including connected supply rooms, linen stations, and equipment. Because patient rooms were arranged around the nursing station, it made sense to localize supplies and services. Likewise, connections to important people and information--patient charts, doctors, pharmacists and phones--were centrally located too, just a few steps from the nurses station. In the s, a man named Gordon Friesen, an architect and logistics expert, proffered a simple notion: The added efficiency would, as the thinking went, lead to better quality of care at continually less cost. Friesen had landed on one of the few aspects of healthcare that everyone agrees on--patients are best served by having nurses with them in their rooms. Patients, their loved ones, executives, doctors, and nurses themselves all want to have nurses face-to-face with patients as much as possible. Admissions and discharges take up most of this face-to-face time. Generally, patients see their nurses briefly every hour or two, which neither patients nor nurses find satisfactory. Today the nursing station is all but gone. Now already several minutes behind in getting medication, the nurse is assessing another patient who, say, needs supplies too. But unfortunately, those supplies are stocked in a different room from the medication. Leaving to get both, the nurse runs into a family member there to see their loved one. It just so happens to be her patient, and that patient needed their medication seven minutes ago. But then Transport calls. At present, nursing is a decentralized system of continually changing needs. As seen in the preceding paragraph, the failure to connect services to nurses increasingly burdens the daily activities of nursing. The difficulty arises for nurses because while nursing activities are decentralized, supporting services remained centralized. This mismatch in operational processes ensures each nurse will spend time hunting for, fetching, and clarifying what their patients need. This is further complicated by frequent failures in these mismatched processes. Consider our proxy for hospitals across the country: At AWH, medical equipment is upgraded regularly by contract with vendors in an effort to keep costs low, or to replace older outdated equipment. Usually this new equipment requires specific supporting supplies. A great example is an IV pump--a piece of equipment used all the time at AWH to introduce vital fluids and medications to the body. At AWH, leaders coordinate the new equipment supply needs for the upgraded IV pumps for each participating department during the roll-out phase. However, many times implementation proceeds faster than expected. Confident in their planning and adaptability, AWH decides to roll the entire project out in record time, ahead of schedule. Nurses in various departments, lacking the proper supporting equipment and documentation, panic--adding tension to an already stressful job. The sudden flurry of ordering hits the Materials Supply Department, which then overcompensates by over-ordering, then overstocking. The overstocking causes both storage and delivery issues as problems begin to ripple outward. Nurses scrambling for linen, supplies, equipment, or waiting to clarify a medication prescription are just a few examples. These types of process failures and hundreds more like them, happen thousands of times every day in every hospital across the United States. There is a serious scandal in healthcare: The burdens of regulation, cost reductions, and quality initiatives piled onto nurses and other clinicians are undeniable. Without real operational gains and improvements, nurses will continue to be inundated with yet more of the same, and its impact will be evermore noticeable. Do you spend time looking for supplies and equipment to care for your patients?
