Winding down to Halloween proper now, so a grab-bag of items—a little Karloff, a little Esperanto, a little Oscar Wilde. The Esperanto is that daft film Incubus, with William Shatner, which really does unfold entirely in the international language intended to promote world peace. Cajoled into spending the night by an antiquities scholar Jason Robards, Sr. The house also has a spooky housekeeper, a young hottie Ellen Drew who may or may not be a vorvolaka, a Greek mythical monster; a British consul Alan Napier and his invalid wife the extremely unsettling Katherine Emery. The invalid has a fear of being buried alive, since she is prone to cataleptic states—and of course she ends up being carted off to the tomb; great revelation scene, as we hear her scratching away at the wood from inside. When she breaks out, she drifts around in a diaphanous gown, grabs an ancient trident, and stabs the peasant woman and Karloff with it. The Karloff character, a general, holds no faith, but eventually becomes convinced that Drew is a vorvolaka, and pesters her until she has to sneak away with the reporter. They are all waiting for a sirocco, the wind that will blow the plague away, which results in a static but interesting idyll. The antiquarian has a little kettle in the backyard, to which he makes burned offerings to Hermes. A three-headed statue of Cereberus serves as an oft-seen totem. Some good windy, outdoor atmosphere, when Drew goes out walking and hears a strange birdcall and possibly a human voice. Not too suspenseful overall, but the air of civilized resignation is palpable, as people except Karloff meet their deaths with stoical acceptance. Mark Robson directed, in the house style, with some tone-deaf line readings. Incubus Only movie shot in Esperanto, , with William Shatner. The story itself is almost certainly influenced by the Bergman of Seventh Seal and Virgin Spring, and the language makes it sound arty and European. He leaves his hauntingly gorgeous sister Ann Atmar to go off with the vixen, who later summons up the incubus from the earth. Much daffy good-evil stuff and a lot of fantastic lighting later, Shatner crawls mortally wounded to a church, bringing the girl with him, but not before she is apparently raped by the Incubus in the form of a goat. He also says the shooting was conducted in Esperanto. Written and directed by Leslie Stevens, of Outer Limits fame. Also great 60s-style credits, a la the Corman pictures of the time. And a link to my piece on Dorian Gray.

After arguing about the search for their father. Plot Edit Burkitsville, Indiana " One Year Ago A newlywed couple is leaving after the locals have helped them out when they got lost and stopped for gas. They go to check it out and on the way see an ominous-looking scarecrow suspended from a pole. The scarecrow seems to move as they head off into the woods " as they proceed they hear noises behind them and run for their car. The guy disappears and the woman turns, shouting his name, and stumbles over the corpse of her husband. A shadowy figure closes in on her as she screams. Dean takes the names, which are of three couples who disappeared over a three year-period on the same day in April. Dean accuses him of being selfish and takes off without him when Sam insists he go. Dean pulls into Burkitsville and thinks about calling Sam, but decides against it. He meets with a local man, Scotty , but the man claims not to recognize the pictures of the missing couples. Sam comes across a young hitchhiker , who gets picked up by a guy in a van who refuses to take Sam. Their niece, Emily, recognizes the newlywed husband, Vince, from the tattoo, and her parents then remember them and say that they headed off towards the highway. Dean leaves town, but his EMF meter goes off as he passes by the orchard. He investigates and spots the scarecrow, holding a sickle. He comments that the scarecrow is "fugly" but on closer inspection notices something is off about the scarecrow - it seems to have been made of human skin. Dean pulls back into town and talks to Emily. She reveals that the Jorgesons are her aunt and uncle who took her in when her parents died, and that the town is seemingly "blessed. Sam is unable to get a bus out and meets back up with the female hitchhiker, Meg, and they bond. Dean, who knows that this is a ruse, offers to help them fix it faster than that, but they decline. He gives them an ominous warning but they ignore him and Dean contemplates how Sam could have convinced them. Scotty calls the sheriff , who runs Dean out of town. Come nightfall, Dean returns into town while the newest couple wander through the orchard and are stalked by the scarecrow. They run for it and Dean gets in front of them and sends them to their car. He opens up on the scarecrow with a shotgun to no effect, but they all get safely back to the car as the scarecrow disappears. Dean checks in with Sam and they conclude that the scarecrow is a manifestation of a pagan god and takes the couple fattened up by the locals as a fertility sacrifice. The two of them kind of apologize to each other and Dean admits Sam has to do his own thing and he admires him for standing up to their dad. Dean meets with a local professor William B. Davis who provides information on a Norse god, the Vanir, which the locals of Scandinavian descent imported with them. According to the books, its energy springs from a sacred tree. Dean thanks him for his help and goes out of the room The townsfolk are discussing what to do with Dean and how the Vanir is angry with them and the sacrifice must be made. It becomes clear that the Jorgesons are going to use Emily for the female sacrifice, and they toss her down into the cellar with Dean. Meg tries to get him to come with her but he refuses and heads off. Dean figures out that they have to destroy the old tree the Vanir is tied to. Come sunset, Sam arrives and frees them but the scarecrow has already disappeared from where he was. The three of them run off through the orchard, planning to come back in the morning to torch the tree, but the locals intercept them. The townspeople run off and Sam, Dean and Emily get clear. The next morning they find the First Tree, inscribed with runes, and the brothers prepare to torch it. Emily insists on setting it on fire herself and it goes up in flames. Later at night, Meg is driving off with some guy in a van and asks him to pull over, which the guy takes as an invitation for sex. She pulls out a silver goblet, cuts his throat with a knife, and catches the blood in the cup. She then recites an incantation and questions why she was ordered to let Sam go. She receives a silent explanation and responds, "Yes " yes, father".
