Its light is positioned as being protective and keeping out the evils of the world, but only for so long. The poem ends with a plea for Venus to stay and protect his flock from the dangers of the night. Smile on our loves, and while thou drawest the Blue curtains of the sky, scatter thy silver dew On every flower that shuts its sweet eyes In timely sleep. Let thy west wind sleep on The lake; speak silence with thy glimmering eyes, And wash the dusk with silver. Soon, full soon, Dost thou withdraw; then the wolf rages wide, And then the lion glares through the dun forest: William Blake Click through the tabs below to explore my analysis of different aspects of the poem. ContextThemesContentLanguage and techniquesStructureTone Context Another contender for the title of GOAT at least in British eyes , Blake actually enjoyed very little renown during his life and only posthumously became recognised as one of the seminal names in poetry. Instead you will have to be content with information relating specifically to this poem. Blake was deeply religious, but was quite passionately anti-organised religion. Throughout his life he claimed to have had religious visions and considered religion to be something of a personal experience rather than something to be dictated by a priest. In this poem he not only creates a pastoral scene of splendid natural beauty, which he ties to sexuality. He also appeals directly to the Big Man Upstairs to keep him on the straight and narrow. Themes This is another poem that has a clear dual theme of the restorative power and beauty of sleep, while at the same time acknowledging a religious power that is represented through the protective power of the light in the dark. Content This poem is a sonnet of appreciation and love directed towards the brightest star in the night sky. This star is in fact a planet and not a star. Although it looks like a star, you can usually tell it is not because it is brighter than all the rest and has a constant light rather than the twinkle twinkling of actual stars off in the far reaches of the cosmos. Blake proceeds to create devastatingly beautiful imagery of this star emerging as the sun dips down below the mountains, as Venus becomes visible as the sun sets. This beauty is seen as a form of loving embrace that soothes us or watches over us as we retreat to our beds. With the loss of this protective light, the wolf and the lion begin to range and hunt, which represents spiritual dangers and the temptations that many lead us to stray from our religious morality. However, Blake feels like the lingering silver dew left by Venus is enough to protect those bathed in it. This clearly links to spirituality and the light cast upon the darkness can be seen as the strength to resist temptation provided by religious faith and morality. In this case it is not the star or planet , but the divine role he ascribes to it that is the subject of his affection. It is also known as the wandering star as it seems to move more quickly across the sky than the distant real stars and disappears more quickly from sight as the Earth rotates us away from it. The first of these roles is to cast light on the Earth when the Sun disappears. As a torch clearly this light is weaker than the Sun, but a torch helps us find our way in the darkness. Here Blake creates a duality of meaning as this is both literal light being cast on the world and also him referencing faith and religious belief as being lights guiding us away from the dangers of the dark or temptation. Perhaps you could also connect this to sexual shenanigans. Thus the light guides us to bed and watches over our loving. This notion is further supported by the fact that Venus was also the Roman Goddess of Love and Beauty. Literally this dew is the silvery light cast upon the Earth by the light of the stars, which is then given a physical residue with the dew or wetness we find upon the grass upon a spring morning. As the star closes the curtains on the day and casts protective dew across the Earth, so to does it bring the world to peace. All these elements not only combines to form a vivid and majestic piece of natural imagery, but also reflect a calm and serene mood and atmosphere to the scene. Why is this protection needed? Blake symbolises the dangers of temptation or straying from the path of the faithful with the ferocity of the animal kingdom. Both these metaphors represent the dangers that lurk, hidden in the darkness. The animals used to represent this danger are those we would most associate with ruthlessness, stealth and ferocity and thus we should reflect that Blake wants us to recognise the magnitude of the dangers for those straying from the path of the faithful. If we connect these ideas with sexuality we can see that the physical act of sex is a primal and animalistic, which opens us up to the risk of giving into these savage passion, just as animals. This interpretation does stray from my idea of Venus being protective and sees it as an alternate to God in that it supports our more sensual side. However, never fear as Venus will protect us from these urges! The concept of this physical dew cast down protectives by the Evening Star is revisited in the final two lines. Structure This is a very unusual sonnet as it does not follow the rhyming conventions of either Petrarchan or Shakespearean sonnets and instead has no rhyme scheme at all. The fact it is a sonnet demonstrates the love or appreciation that Blake directs towards faith, but the lack of rhyme could be seen in two ways. I interpreted it as a deliberate attempt by Blake to focus us on the simple natural beauty of this dusk time scene, stripping back the poem to allow the imagery to dominate. However, you could also see this as being an artistic challenge to the rules, as Blake was a bit of an individual. Even without a rhyme scheme as such, we do see a number of internal rhymes within lines bright " light; smile " whie; sky " thy , which I see as Blake indicating that even though this is a rustic, simple pastoral image, its sheer beauty inspires rhyme and order. You should also make some mention of the consistent use of consonance alliteration throughout the poem. The effect is much like the shushing of the wind being described as the poem soothes us towards silence and rest. Tone Throughout we have an air of worship and awe towards this celestial figure. At times Blake runs away with his enthusiasm for the beauty of the imagery, or of the act of physical love, but at the end of the poem he is very much back to recognising the vulnerability of man and thus is supplicant towards the heavens and their protective powers.
