How can I hear the pronunciation of a word? The word must be in boldface and followed by a red audio icon: Click on the audio icon and the audio pronunciation will play automatically. What hardware and software is required? Your computer must have a properly configured sound card and a set of speakers or headphones. We also recommend that you have a stand-alone audio player application that supports WAV sound files e. Windows Media Player installed on your computer in the event that the pronunciation does not play automatically when you click on the audio icon. Most newer operating systems come bundled with an audio player. Your browser should be configured to automatically associate WAV sound files with your audio player. Can I hear pronunciations with JavaScript disabled? The pronunciation pop-up window is a JavaScript window, and the pronunciation will not play unless the pop-up window opens. Do all entries include an audio pronunciation? No, only those entries that have pronunciations listed in the definition have audio pronunciations. Among those that do not are thesaurus entries, abbreviations, and open compounds, such as "bird dog" and "red herring," the elements of which are pronounced at the "bird," "dog," "red," and "herring" entries. Also excluded are many entry words that appear within other entries, such as "stillness" at the end of the "still" entry. Words that are spelled and pronounced the same but entered separately, such as "crane" the noun and "crane" the verb, are a special case: How many audio pronunciations are there in the online dictionary? Why do some words have more than one audio icon? These entries have more than one variant pronunciation. Click on each audio icon to hear each variant. Why do some words have multiple pronunciations listed in the definition but only one audio pronunciation? In many cases where there are multiple variant pronunciations only the first, most common variant is offered in audio format. Why are only certain parts of some compound words pronounced? This happens when part of the compound is already pronounced elsewhere in the dictionary. For example, at the "Grand Teton" entry "Grand" is not pronounced because it is already pronounced at the "grand" entry; "Teton" is pronounced, however, because there is no entry or pronunciation for "Teton" by itself. Similarly, at "Hohokam Pima National Monument," only the audio pronunciation "Hohokam Pima" is given, because "national" and "monument" are pronounced at their own entries. The beginning of the audio pronunciation is clipped. What can I do? Click on the "hear it again" link to replay the pronunciation until it no longer sounds clipped. You may have to replay the pronunciation more than once. What can I do about the audio skipping? Click on the "hear it again" link to replay the pronunciation until it no longer skips. If the pronunciations skip consistently try clicking on the "Click here to listen with your default audio player" link. If they are skipping with your default audio player, you may have to change your default audio player. If you have other questions about the audio pronunciation feature, contact us by using the Web Site Support form.

Now, swearing in Mandarin is not the same as swearing in German , French , or Spanish. So, practice your Mandarin tones whenever you can. The translations from Chinese to English sound like odd curse words. Some of the more humorous translated curses are the most offensive in China and Taiwan. A good deal of Chinese swear words uses eggs. Either way, eggs play a large factor in Mandarin curses and insults. These vary from rather innocuous to downright mean. No one has the definite answer, but eggs and Chinese curse words go together quite well. Anyway, here are just some of the basic Chinese swear words you can use: However, use precaution whenever calling someone a bad person in any situation. Especially when it involves eggs. For a more expansive Chinese curse word to use on the not so smart, keep reading. However, it could also be attributed to a more popular and hurtful description: This egg-based insult pretty much covers the gamut of adjectives for the simple. Hitting the family bloodline is big in Chinese cursing. No word on if this would be what Westeros calls Jon Snow. It is rather innocuous and considered a rather tame curse word. The common belief is that this used to mean a person of low stature but is now a bit of self-deprecating online humor. Expect to hear Mandarin speakers using some of these insults when angry with situations and other people: Then use this Taiwanese slang when you want someone to shut up. It also works when expressing your general annoyance with someone. It works perfectly when driving or navigating the city streets. Use with extreme caution. As a common phrase in major cities across the world. Unless you are talking about a female dog. Then, use a bit more liberally. Want them to get out of there? When it comes to language learning, I think the common view is that grammar is one of the most boring and tedious things to wade through in the process. That means that you can rejoice in the fact that you can say goodbye to conjugation tables, gender agreements at least while learning Cantonese. It does have certain rules, but these rules are simpler and fewer when compared to other languages. For me, I recommend gaining a basic understanding of grammar. I understand some people are opposed to studying grammar. My views are a bit more conservative. An incorrect understanding of those basic rules mean that sentences degrade to a collection of words, and we as learners are prone to making the same basic mistakes over and over again. I reckon that to read through 20 – 30 explanations on different structures, it should take about 2 months if you read at a fairly leisurely pace and get a bit of practice. So, with a grammar resource, I recommend tackling structures the following way: Then read the explanation once. Go back and connect with the sample sentence and see if it makes sense. Based on that sentence, try to mimic it and write a similar sentence. Then try to write a sentence without these restrictions – any sentence that pops to mind that fits this structure. If possible, have it checked by a native speaker. I believe this is the best way to consolidate grammar points in Cantonese. After all, less is more, right? Cantolounge grammar series Actually, the main bulk of the content here at Cantolounge is devoted to breaking down Cantonese structures and providing examples to supplement them. You can read over them to determine if the style of presentation here is suited to your needs. The main reason for that, and this is really important, is because words up till this stage are very unlikely to diverge in meaning. These become harder to use translate directly using a dictionary. In other words, you have to determine the scope of what you need. Here are two excellent resources in English that you can use to translate back to Cantonese and get started in preparing your answers. Rather than explaining to you what it is, I think it might just be easier to show you with examples. Instead of thinking of grammar, or even structures, for Cantonese, it might be helpful to think of templates that you can use as scaffolds to place your words in. If I had to visualize it, it looks something like fill in the word exercises that we used to do as kids: This is the power of understanding some basic grammar, and what comprises a structure, in helping you create interesting Cantonese sentences all on your own.
