The population was 1, at the census. The unincorporated communities of Alden Corners and Roxbury are located in the town. The unincorporated community of Lutheran Hill is also located partially in the town. Five years later, Charles Floyd, an Eastern speculator, established a company whose goal was to build an exemplary city in the Midwest. Then he drew up a map depicting streets, public buildings, and parks in what he called the "City of Superior", boasting that he would make the area known throughout the country. The census showed only two residents in the town. In , Agoston Haraszthy , a colorful[7][8] nobleman and political refugee from Hungary , arrived in the United States. By , he had purchased a large parcel of land where Sauk City now stands. Then in , Rev. Adelbert Inama, a Norbertine missionary originally from the Tirol in Austria , arrived in the area. It lies in a district of the Wisconsin Territory as healthful as it is fruitful, on the elevated shores of the Wisconsin River, opposite Prairie du Sac , in the midst of mining districts, only 20 English miles from the capital, Madison , and well suited to become quickly and easily populated. The place is joined in three different directions with European seaports, by means of an unbroken waterway: I certainly maintain that at present few localities can outdo the environs of Sac Prairie in fertility, variety, romantic beauty, and healthfulness of climate. One wanted "Nelson", after Admiral Nelson , the hero of the English wife of the town chairman; another wanted "Roxbury", after a town in New York where some of the settlers originated. A tie vote resulted in the secretary casting the deciding ballot for Roxbury. Though it has been enlarged several times, the building remains at the core of the present church. Because Roxbury was populated almost exclusively by Germans,[3] German was spoken in the community for over 80 years, well into the s. Given the proximity of the town to the city of Madison , concerns have been raised about development in the town. The key goals that were identified by residents of the town of Roxbury and delineated in the plan were to preserve agricultural land and agriculture as a way of life, to preserve natural resources and wildlife, to preserve areas of cultural and historic importance, and to carefully site and design new development so as to maintain the existing character of the town. Throughout the town, small areas of prairie are interspersed with oak groves. In the north lie several small lakes, including Crystal Lake and Fish Lake. Springs, ponds, and creeks also dot the area. A vineyard, the successor to one founded by Agoston Haraszthy, lies in the northwest, overlooking the Wisconsin River.
