Back to Video Craig James Ostler: In this Palmyra Building, Egbert B. Grandin printed the first copies of the Book of Mormon in Palmyra village. He had been open less than one year, when approached about printing copies of the Book of Mormon. Grandin was a year-old publisher at the time that Joseph Smith approached him to print the Book of Mormon. Grandin had been in the publishing business since he was Such a large order without solid financial backing, did not interest Mr. Grandin in addition to the fact that he disagreed with the project on religious principles, and he refused the project. Grandin managed his business from this office. Thus, it was most likely here that the Prophet Joseph Smith contracted with E. Grandin to publish the Book of Mormon. The typesetting process in the days of Joseph Smith was a very difficult and detailed process. Everything that you see on the printed page, including space between words, indents, and everything else required somebody by hand to insert a little piece of metal type. One average page of the Book of Mormon contains about separate little pieces of metal. After the type had been set, each sheet was printed on an Acorn Hand Press and hung to dry, after which they were taken to the second floor to the bindery. The Book of Mormon was bound in leather in this room. The printer sheets came down from the third floor and were here cut in half to make two sheets of 16 pages. These sheets were then folded into what was known as a signature page. A total of 37 signature pages composed the first edition of the Book of Mormon. The signature sheets were placed in the standing book press, with its screw-like mechanism adding pressure as it twisted down to flatten the pages. To the side of the press is the planing table at which the folded edges were trimmed to allow them to open for reading. Next, the signature sheets were stitched together with needle and thread at the sewing table and passed to the gluing table. Leather sheepskin stretched over cardboard for the book cover was attached to the pages and the titleâ€”The Book of Mormonâ€”was embossed in gold leaf. Yes, it looks very familiar. It lines up even referring to the seven double-banded gold lines on the spine of both volumes Reid Moon: I am wondering if this is something that the typesetter knew about, if Joseph requested itâ€” or Oliver, orâ€” Reid Moon: Somebody in the mix would have seen this referring to the Bible. He was a member of the Fairchild family, descendants of Thomas Fairchild of Stratford, Connecticut. He continued his studies at Iowa State and at Rutgers with his uncle, Byron Halsted, a noted biologist. He received an honorary D. Barbour Lathrop, a wealthy world traveler, persuaded Fairchild to become a plant explorer for the US Department of Agriculture. Fairchild was the author of a number of popular books on his plant collecting expeditions. Of those early travels, Fairchild wrote, "I am glad that I saw a few of the quiet places of the world before the coming of automobiles." Department of Agriculture in Washington, D. C. One accomplishment was to help introduce the cherry trees from Japan to Washington. Fairchild was a member of the board of trustees of the National Geographic Society, [9] and an officer in what is now called the Alexander Graham Bell Association for the Deaf and Hard of Hearing. They named it "The Kampong", after similar family compounds in Java, Indonesia, where Fairchild had spent so many happy days collecting plants. He covered this property with an extraordinary collection of rare tropical trees and plants and eventually wrote a book about the place, entitled "The World Grows Round my Door". Fairchild was a member of the board of regents of the University of Miami from 1915 to 1918. For three of those years he was chairman of the board. A daughter, Nancy Bell, married another entomologist, Marston Bates, author of many books on natural history. She herself wrote a book about living in rural Colombia during the 1920s: David Grandison Fairchild is commemorated in the scientific name of a species of lizard, Anolis fairchildi. Beside sharing his legendary tropical botanical expertise, Fairchild provided graphic accounts of native cultures he was able to see before their modernization. He was an accomplished photographer and illustrated these books himself. The World Was My Garden: Travels of a Plant Explorer. The Discovery was "the most deserving book which failed to receive adequate sales and recognition". National Geographic Society, Fairchild also wrote numerous monographs about plants, plant exploring, and the transportation and cultivation of new plants in the United States. Botanical Citation[edit] The standard author abbreviation D. Fairchild is used to indicate this person as the author when citing a botanical name.
