Skip section The episode begins in the morning on the bus. Gumball is playing a game of "Would you Rather?" Molly takes up on his offer and begins to tell everyone on the bus a story of her life; despite all the buildup to a satisfying climax, her story only tells of a time when she turned off the faucet. This continues until the bus arrives at school. In the library, Gumball tries again to communicate to Molly that her stories are mundane by using the editing software to cut out any of the actual "story. Molly then proceeds to tell the boys more of her life stories throughout class time and up until lunch. At lunch, Molly is still yapping away about her tame life, and the Watterson brothers, deciding that they have had enough try to literally tune her out. However, Molly says relatively interesting words in her stories such as explosion, murder, and backflip that peak the interests of the boys only for the words to be used in a boring context that cause Gumball and Darwin to tune out again. Simultaneously, Jamie walks toward her class with a menacing grin on her face and a dodgeball in her hands. All the students are getting pelted by dodgeballs, and the Watterson duo prepare to take a hit; Molly takes a hit for them, though, explaining that this is her way of expressing gratitude for the boys taking their time to listen to her. Despite the emotional tension, Molly manages to recover quickly from the ball and continues to tell her stories. The next day, Molly arrives at school, but she can not seem to find anyone, specifically Gumball and Darwin. It is revealed that the two are trying to hide from Molly in order to avoid listening to her stories. Quickly, the two find a hiding spot in an old abandoned restroom. Just when they are settling into the location, they run into Molly. Surprised, the two decide to ask why Molly is here. They are saddened to hear that Molly hides here "her special dark place" when she feels awkward and lonely. After hearing these words, the two brothers walk out of the room with one motivation: They manage to enlist the help of several students and staff to help after they reveal that they too have been hiding from Molly. Ten minutes pass, and Molly walks out of "her special dark place. The "story" starts by Bobert walking from around the corner to greet Molly, only for him to short circuit from water pouring out of the water fountain with that being controlled by Carrie. Bobert then hits Tina, who out of anger, thrusts Bobert into the wall with her tail; Bobert then transforms into combat mode and duels with Tina. Upon their exposure, the nurse throws a bottle of chemicals that nearly hits Molly. Small emerges from his office and inhales these chemicals; this causes him to go "insane" and trip the Coach who falls down the stories of the building. Excited, Molly goes to the playground to tell Gumball and Darwin of what she has just observed. Initially, it seems as if Molly has not learned anything from the experience because she drones about the mundane details and not any of the "plot-points"; at the end, however, Molly reveals that she knew that the whole ordeal was a fake scenario set up by the boys to give her an interesting story. Touched by the act, Molly kisses the boys on the forehead as a sign of friendship, and then, ending the episode.

The thesis sank without a trace, but Vonnegut continued throughout his life to promote the big idea behind it, which was: The Vermont researchers describe the six story shapes behind more than English novels as: Rags to riches “a steady rise from bad to good fortune 2. Riches to rags “a fall from good to bad, a tragedy 3. Icarus “a rise then a fall in fortune 4. Oedipus “a fall, a rise then a fall again 5. Cinderella “rise, fall, rise 6. Depending on the lexicon chosen, a word can be categorised as positive happy or negative sad, or it can be associated with one or more of eight more subtle emotions, including fear, joy, surprise and anticipation. While not a perfect tool “it looks at words in isolation, ignoring context “it can be surprisingly insightful when applied to larger chunks of text, as this blog post on Jane Austen novels from data scientist Julia Silge shows. The tools to do sentiment analysis are freely available, and much out-of-copyright literature can be downloaded from online repository Project Gutenberg. Sure enough, things start off badly in the Divine Comedy with a low sentiment score that sinks further as the duo descend through the circles of hell. Her grieving husband, after discovering her multiple infidelities, then dies too, and their now-orphaned daughter is sent to live with her grandmother, who also dies. The little girl goes to live with a poor aunt, who sends her to work in a cotton mill. Romeo and Juliet William Shakespeare, Story type: After all, the boy must find the girl and fall in love with her before they both lose each other. The romantic peak happens around a quarter of the way through the play, in the famous balcony scene in which they declare their undying love for one another. Pride and Prejudice Jane Austen, Story type: Things take a darker turn as Bingley leaves and Elizabeth starts to develop a dislike for Darcy based on a misunderstanding, naturally. At one point, the Creature gets to take over the narrative, making the novel a story within a story within a story. This is in fact a moment of respite in what is overall a downward trajectory from the happy description of his early life with which Victor opens his narrative, to the appalling ending. At a pivotal moment two thirds of the way through the novel, the Creature offers Victor a way out “make him a female companion. From this point on, his fate is sealed. And so it proves. That is, things get generally better for the duckling over the course of the story, but there are flashes of light and dark along the way: He discovers he can swim better than the other ducks and experiences a premonition of affinity as a group of swans fly over yay! He does become a swan eventually, in a way entirely foretold from the beginning.
