Then we have good news for you, that is, if you have $7, a month to spare on rent. The LA-based architect's Santa Monica home has been put up for lease following his recent re-location to Cheviot Hills.

The award-winning architect Thom Mayne—known for his daringly complex buildings around the world—finally designs one for himself. Mayne, a tall and gangly year-old, is almost incapable of doing unprovocative work. His upcoming projects span the globe, from a research building in Seoul to the U. His living room cantilevers over the pool and has a partially see-through floor that reveals the water below. The glass walls fronting the pool open completely, so guests can dive right in from the living room. This is not Morphosis. Partly clad in metal with large, semi-perforated circle shapes—imagine hole-punched hanging chads—the home is one complex puzzle. The main house is only 1, square feet above grade, but an adjacent guest one adds another Mayne wanted to prove something, too. It should just about disappear. It proves I can do something softer. Spencer Lowell Softer, maybe, but not safe. The main staircase has a portion that seems impassable to all but tiny children, since another volume juts into its space; you have to walk around that volume, but as you do, you discover two new vistas: But he only built on one-fifth the allowable volume. By starting low, he was able to play with levels the house has eight elevation points and insulate from prying eyes. The driveway gate is part of the green wall, so a portion moves aside when it opens. Thanks to the design, the normally private couple can spend a lot of time outside. Spencer Lowell That kind of unconventional, disruptive thinking has marked his CV since founding Morphosis in Mayne spent much of his early career as an uncompromising, largely academic architect—he was a founding faculty member at the L. But in the s, with projects like the brilliantly fragmented Diamond Ranch High School in , his work started to get noticed, and today Morphosis is one of the most sought-after architecture shops. But it was the small, s bungalow in Santa Monica where the Maynes raised their two sons—not his previous signature projects—that inspired the size and feel of this hideaway. Their former home was famously quirky: The shower, for example, was in the middle of the living room. And when their adult sons, now both well over six feet tall, came to visit, it became clear that the family had long outgrown the house. No guest is encouraged to stay too long, by design: Spencer Lowell But guests can certainly feel at home in this very open-plan living space. The bed looks across the tops of palm trees to the shower. Next to the tub is a curved bench that Mayne sits on to chat with her when she has her nightly bath.

Architecture Science fiction writer Ray Bradbury lived in the same house in Cheviot Hills for 50 years. A couple years ago architect Thom Mayne, and wife Blythe Alison-Mayne, bulldozed it to build a new home. Now that home is almost complete. The perpetrator of this outrage? Read the story, below. He has won the prestigious Pritzker Prize. The moving gate will eventually have a hedge that moves with it photo: The interplay of vertical and horizontal planes with lush finishes, like a gorgeous, glittery, olive green, perforated metal cladding, brings to mind early experiments in abstraction like the Barcelona Pavilion by Mies van der Rohe. The way it sits within resplendent planting makes it feel like Modernism in the jungle. Thom crosses the entryway bridge which in turns crosses a lap pool that runs the length of the lower level living space photo: It starts with the way you live and an architecture that supports or even advances in the way you communicate and the rituals you have in your day to day life. What does he have to do with your home? The density and the quality of the creative activity that is going there is just unheard of. Now he is busy with a group called Building Forward LA trying to push the City to adopt more progressive building practices. The model for him, he says, is Elon Musk. And I think the city has to be more aggressive about being open to innovation and, of all cities, this is a city that has tremendous intellectual creative capital in its design community and in the engineering community. And it should be turned loose. Click here for details. Read more about Merry Norris and her art collection, here. Thom Mayne's drawing for the Sixth Street House invokes architectural conventions only to surpass their limitations. By collapsing plan, elevation, and detail through juxtapositions of scale, obliquity, projection, and rotation, Mayne challenges the historical view of drawing as a passive medium at the service of architecture.
