How Our Self-image is Shaped by Society By Joachim Vogt Isaksen Do you sometimes experience that the mere presence of other people leads to feelings of discomfort and tension? When not knowing exactly what other people think of you it may lead to self-doubt and feelings of insecurity. According to the American sociologist Charles Horton Cooley , the degree of personal insecurity you display in social situations is determined by what you believe other people think of you. The view of ourselves comes from the contemplation of personal qualities and impressions of how others perceive us. Actually, how we see ourselves does not come from who we really are, but rather from how we believe others see us. The main point is that people shape their self-concepts based on their understanding of how others perceive them. We form our self-image as the reflections of the response and evaluations of others in our environment. As children we were treated in a variety of ways. If parents, relatives and other important people look at a child as smart, they will tend to raise him with certain types of expectations. As a consequence the child will eventually believe that he is a smart person. This is a process that continues when we grow up. For instance, if you believe that your closest friends look at you as some kind of superhero, you are likely to project that self-image, regardless of whether this has anything to do with reality. The concept of the looking glass-self theory constitutes the cornerstone of the sociological theory of socialization. According to Cooley, this process has three steps. First, we imagine how we appear to another person. Sometimes this imagination is correct, but may also be wrong since it is merely based on our assumptions. Second, we imagine what judgments people make of us based on our appearance. Lastly, we imagine how the person feels about us, based on the judgments made of us. The ultimate result is that we often change our behavior based on how we feel people perceive us. So how can we, or anyone else, know who we really are? All people want to be liked and be appreciated for talents or personality. Sometimes, others evaluations mean more to us than our own. We are not consciously aware that we often try to conform to the image that we imagine other people expect from us. If a person develops a negative self-image the self-esteem will tend to be low. Low self esteem and poor self-image has long been associated with a whole range of psychological problems, and it is necessary to counter the passive individual that depends heavily on the social world for building self-image. Hence, we should develop a self-image that is more based on our own evaluations rather than how we believe others look at us. The concept of the looking glass self offers insight not only into our own thinking, but also to how we form our identity based on how others see us. As long as we are interacting with others we are vulnerable for changing our own self-image, a process that will continue throughout our lives. An exploration of the social significance of Shrek from a variety of theoretical perspectives, this book pursues two different, yet intertwined objectives.

Founder and Executive Director In , with the support of my husband, Hal Kirshbaum, I founded Through the Looking Glass TLG to develop model services for infants, children and parents with disabilities and their families. Hal and I first set up Through the Looking Glass in a converted garage in the backyard of our Berkeley home. We discovered that attitudinal problems were also reflected in research and writing about parents with disabilities and their children. We became interested in doing family research from the perspective of the disability community. From the beginning we emphasized a "non-pathological" perspective in both clinical services and research. Rather than emphasizing deficits in individuals with disabilities and their families we emphasized lessening the deficits in society that create obstacles in the lives of our families. When we identified pathological preconceptions we examined and challenged them. For instance the generalized assumption that children of parents with disabilities are "parentified" has been addressed in a series of research projects focused so far on infancy, school-age children, and teenagers. During research and services we gathered the solutions of experienced and mentor parents with disabilities and channeled their knowledge to new parents or newly disabled parents or families who were particularly stressed. We have sought staff with diversity in perspective, fostering teamwork between individuals with and without personal disability experience, individuals with diverse family roles, from diverse cultures and professional disciplines. We think this diversity in perspective helps us be more sensitive to difference in families and fuels our development and creativity as a work community. Even our name, Through the Looking Glass, underscores the valuing of different perspectives, which we consider to be one of the strengths of disability experience. Over the years TLG had an increasingly central role in the national disability community, networking, providing training and consultation regarding parents with all disabilities and their children. All of this work is part of an effort to increase and support more appropriate resources for parents with disabilities and their children. We have been a David competing with or advocating for change with so many Goliaths! Now with over 60 staff in our new facilities including an Early Head Start Center at the Ed Roberts Campus which was a big step up from my renovated garage , we plan to continue to be a catalyst for innovation. We are still committed to changing the world for our families. Join us in that effort! Through the Looking Glass is now in its 33rd year of operations. Our National Center currently provides information, consultation, materials and training regarding the over 4 million U. You can hear audio or read transcripts with pioneers in the movement including interviews with TLG founders Megan and Hal Kirshbaum.
