Thursday starts with E and then does who-knows-what in the afternoon as low pressure overhead triggers thunderstorms. The long range forecast looks more promising: High pressure builds offshore on Friday as a trough of low pressure moves east. No time for this today. Have an awesome day! Disclaimer required by my grad school program: I am not your therapist but I could be 40 graduate school credits from now. I am your weather forecaster. Take everything I say with a grain of salt, and consult with your actual therapist about your mental health issues. I plan to keep doing this forecast indefinitely, even when I am a therapist. Stay down here and the sun will probably find you this afternoon before the sky clouds over again. Wednesday looks cloudy early and sunny by afternoon with convective clouds. Yes, you read that right. Thursday looks sunny to start with thunderstorms in the afternoon. It will be very, very muggy Thursday afternoon. Light wind most of the day. Who knows in the afternoon? Road biking looks amazing today and tomorrow and Thursday morning: Francis House in Odell at 6. Friday and Saturday night brings the Eta Aquarids meteor shower. Have an awesome day today! ### 2: Sunshine and showers will bring thunder to the south ()

So, I've just published a memoir, The Thunder and the Sunshine. It is about the odyssey of my life, an odyssey all of us experience in one form or another.

Now, we often talk about weather being a constant concern for hikers everywhere in any season: Think summer is the safest season to go hiking? You might have a point. Winter hazards such as snow flurries and avalanches tend not to be an issue and the rhetoric about always preparing for the season before and the season after is less daunting. But there are still some key points to consider. Sunburn, Heatstroke, and Dehydration At around 1,m above sea level, Kamikochi is renowned for being cool and breezy in the summer even as down below in the cities and towns people are sweating out degree temperatures. But this feeling can also lull you into a false sense of invulnerability to the heat. In addition to long term risks of skin cancer, burns can cause great discomfort as well as aggravating other heat-related conditions. Heatstroke can also be a problem since people exerting themselves in even moderate summer heat will naturally feel hotter and sweat more, leading to fatigue, dehydration and other hazards. Left untreated, heatstroke can even cause long term damage to vital organs. The Mayo Clinic website offers the following helpful tips one avoiding heatstroke: This is an absolute mountain essential. Never attempt a long hike without ample water and some knowledge of where to refill it. Hats do a lot of the hard work often trusted to sunscreen. Using both is advisable, but be careful not to lose your hat on windy peaks! This will minimize time spent exerting yourself during the hottest periods of the day. Exercise discretion when preparing your gear and changing in and out of clothing. For anyone planning a long hike, cotton clothing should be substituted with breathable, quick dry synthetics. If you find yourself stuck in sweat soaked garb when the temperature drops in the evening, prepare for added discomfort and possible danger. A wealth of options is a good thing with changes in clothing helping you stay dry and comfortable. That sunscreen will come off over the course of a few hours, so keep re-applying it. Just this past weekend in the Togakushi area, I suffered moderate burns on my face, arms, and legs, despite having applied and re-applied cream and spending most of the hike under the cover of trees! Say that you find yourself ridge walking on the Daikiretto around midday with a rest Kitahotaka Lodge only a tantalizing hour away. Despite the beautiful blue skies all around you, a rumble of thunder can be heard in the distance. One key strategy for minimizing this danger is to start and finish your hike early. Since in the summertime you can practically set your watch by the regularity with which thunderstorms hit in the early afternoon, you are well advised to get off the mountain as early as possible to avoid a dangerous run in. Beyond that, just do your best to spend as little time as possible in exposed areas. A few years ago, a hiker was fatally struck by lightning near the peak of Yarigatake after ignoring or possibly not hearing repeated warnings over the loudspeaker of a nearby lodge. The Website Wild Backpacker offers some handy tips about lightning storms here: As a final comment on this subject, we should add that you should definitely be aware of the latest weather forecast before embarking on a long hike. Please bear in mind however, that you can still be surprised by a storm on seemingly clear days. Stay alert and stay safe. Apr 13, Mel rated it it was amazing A truly inspirational book. The epic scale of the obstacles he had to overcome put my little ones into perspective. I had my own experience of a Patagonian headwind and I am astonished how he kept going in his real one. It describes the joys of a trans-Atlantic yacht journey. He arrives in Rio and takes a bus to Tierra del Fuego, so that he can cycle the entire length of south America, heading up the west coast and the Andes. This is a different Al Humphreys. His first year on the road has made him grow. He is more confident as a writer and as a lone traveller. There is much less crying although still a little and his cultural references are less high-culture: Also, in Latin America, he speaks some Spanish and seems to rapidly improve, unlike in much of Africa where he was linguistically isolated until South Africa, where he had once worked. Book two is much fatter and spans four continents. He rides it, but barely mentions it. Canada gets more mention, where he, now a confident adventurer, and an old friend kayak the Yukon. Yes, he is quite, quite mad. His journey is amazing, improvised and funded on a shoestring. These are wholly remarkable books, about a remarkable trip, by a remarkable man who is also a remarkable writer. They may yet comprise a Liff q. He shares his terror, loneliness, apprehension, indecisiveness and much more. Get it, read it, and do it. While the writer raises mine for a couple of charities, that is brought to light only a bit clumsily toward the end of the book. Humphreys does good work putting the reader on the seat of his bike, or at least watching over his shoulder. During some of the chapters, I could not help but wonder at his physical comfort and the toll the ride was taking on his body. While he talks about the rigors of riding, he rarely mentioned how he felt physically I enjoy travel memoirs, and this is a good one. While he talks about the rigors of riding, he rarely mentioned how he felt physically, which may have been overkill. He does discuss this in one of the final summary chapters including that the mental burden was heavier than the physical one. What is most impressive, though, is his writing about the geography he traveled and the people he met. It rides a fine line between being perfectly detailed without overreaching to get his point across. This book could have been a beast to read with a different writer or editor. I cannot imagine the discipline it took to cull out the story and highlights of the trip.

But when the author tells us of his feelings and emotions, especially the honesty in which he writes about his loneliness and self-doubt, and yes, his determination and moments of transcendent happiness - that is what brings Moods of Future Joys and Thunder and Sunshine, to a higher level than the typical travel adventure.
