Photo by Matt Miller. I needed to get out and pedal on some singletrack. That morning, I got the Spartan out for a 2, foot climb to get acquainted with its climbing abilities. I know, not a huge difference. The Spartan 29 is one inch of travel shy of what most downhill bikes have, and for being almost a seven-inch travel bike, it pedals pretty dang good. It was just as easy to maneuver my body around the bike when going over obstacles, and the bike keeps as much traction as you need to get over techy climbs. Some pleasant cable routing on the down tube. The Spartan 29 may not be a great climber, but it feels like a smart climber given how aggressive the bike is. It puts the rider in a very centered position while climbing. The 29er picked up speed quick, wrapped around the berms, and felt stable through the air. On trails like A-Line, it almost gets scary picking up speed on the Spartan. The thing absolutely hauls and I felt like a jet on a runway. A nice molded, rubber chain slap guard keeps things quiet. Rather than a leopard, it jumps like a lion. It still jumps, and you can hit bonus lines, and pop off roots and stumps, but it wants to get back to the ground as soon as possible. The bike is roomy up front, and at times I needed to shift my weight a bit forward around sweeping berms to keep traction up front, but overall, the geometry is a highlight for the bike. The Spartan gets a carbon bash guard on the down tube. With a degree head angle, the Spartan is made to punch through steep rocky chutes and fall lines, while keeping the rider centered on the bike. Component check For the price point of the Spartan model I tested, the component kit was dialed. A Rock Shox Reverb paddle remote is a welcome sight compared to the old push button. RaceFace Next R 36 wheels The top-level build includes the new, very wide, 36mm internal width carbon rims from RaceFace. This is important in places like Whistler, when in August, the turns are blown out and filled with loose soil. Suspension The suspension components are right on par. The rebound knob on the top makes it dummy-proof to dial in, and the shock ships with one volume token already installed, making the bike ready to send. Or, a park rat. The Spartan 29er is meant to punish downhills first and foremost. The carbon-dressed model I tested is light, like lbs, and will get you up tough climbs, with a lot less fuss than the older Spartan did, But if you buy a Spartan 29, stick to its intended use. Conclusion Photo by Matt Miller. The Spartan is an improved climber from the previous generation.

Sidelights A writer of popular and finely wrought young-adult novels and nonfiction, Gary Paulsen joined a select group of YA writers when he received the Margaret A. His work is widely praised by critics, and he has been awarded Newbery Medal Honor Book citations for three of his books: Dogsong, Hatchet, and The Winter Room. Although Paulsen has also written for adult readers, since the mids his focus has been primarily on teens. Name the book that made the biggest impression on you. I bet you read it before you hit puberty. Paulsen was born in Minnesota in , the son of first-generation Danish and Swedish parents. During his childhood, he saw little of his father, who served in the military in Europe during World War II , and little of his mother, who worked in a Chicago ammunicions factory. The effect was profound and lasting. School was a nightmare because I was unbelievably shy, and terrible at sportsâ€™. I wound up skipping most of the ninth grade. Eventually Paulsen was sent again to live with relatives and worked to support himself with jobs as a newspaper boy and as a pin-setter in a bowling alley. Things began to change for the better during his teen years. He found security and support with his grandmother and auntsâ€™"safety nets" as he described them in his interview. A turning point in his life came one sub-zero winter day when, as he was walking past the public library, he decided to stop in to warm up. She recommended westerns and science fiction but every now and then would slip in a classic. I roared through everything she gave me and in the summer read a book a day. It was as though I had been dying of thirst and the librarian had handed me a five-gallon bucket of water. I drank and drank. When he flunked out of college, he joined the U. Army, serving from to , and working with missiles. After his tour of duty was completed, he took extension courses to become a certified field engineer, finding work in the aerospace departments of Bendix and Lockheed corporations. There it occurred to him that he might try and become a writer. After several hours of hard thinking, a way to learn came to me. All I had to do was go to work editing a magazine. Although it soon became apparent to his employers that he had no editorial experience, he once told SATA that "they could see I was serious about wanting to learn, and they were willing to teach me. It probably did more to improve my craft and ability than any other single event in my life. In little over a de- cade, working mainly out of northern Minnesotaâ€™where he returned after becoming disillusioned with Hollywoodâ€™he published nearly forty books and close to two hundred articles and stories for magazines. On a bet with a friend, he once wrote eleven articles and short stories inside four days and sold all of them. His prolific output was interrupted by a libel lawsuit brought against his young-adult novel Winterkill, the powerful story of a semi-delinquent boy befriended by a hard-bitten cop named Duda in a small Minnesota town. Paulsen eventually won the case, but, as he noted, "the whole situation was so nasty and ugly that I stopped writing. I wanted nothing more to do with publishing and burned my bridges, so to speak. To help Paulsen in his hunting job, a friend gave him a team of sled dogs, a gift that ultimately had a profound influence on Paulsen. For food, we had a few beaver carcassesâ€™. I was initiated into this incredibly ancient and very beautiful bond, and it was as if everything that had happened to me before ceased to exist. He entered the grueling twelve-hundred-mile Iditarod race in Alaska in both and , and this experience provided the basis for his award-winning novel Dogsong. Tracker tells about a thirteen-year-old boy who faces his first season of deer hunting alone while his grandfather is bedridden, dying of cancer. Jobe praised the novel in Language Arts as "powerfully written," adding that Paulsen "explores with the reader the innermost frustrations, hurts, and fears of the young boy. Dogsong, a Newbery Medal honor book, is a rite-of-passage novel about a young Inuit boy named Russel who wishes to abandon the increasingly modern ways of his people. Through the guidance of a tribal elder, Russel learns to bow-hunt and dogsled, and eventually leads his own pack of dogs on a trip across Alaska and back. My Life on Boats, and Guts: The True Stories behind Hatchet and the Brian Books Paulsen recounts stories from his own life, many of which he has fictionalized in his young-adult novels. A reviewer noted in Horn Book that the "lure of the wilderness is always a potent draw, and Paulsen evokes its mysteries as well as anyone since Jack London. Paulsen describes a different kind of growing up in Harris and Me: Contemplative by nature, Duane finds that his ongoing observations of a bird preparing to leave the nest outside his bedroom window parallel his own growing need for independence. Describing The Amazing Life of Birds as "a quick and enjoyable take on school and family," Booklist contributor Todd Morning maintained that Paulsen captures the interest of reluctant readers by sustaining a "tone [that is] light and amusing. In fact, the twelve-year-old narrator of Lawn Boy is overwhelmed by success. He begins a lawn-mowing service and quickly finds that his service is in great demand. When a cash-strapped client barter his services as an investment consultant for a regularly maintained lawn, the narrator gets a crash course in capitalism but finds that a growing portfolio can quickly translate into a growing headache. In books like Nightjohn, Mr. Tucket, and The Legend of Bass Reeves: Nightjohn is set in the nineteenth-century American South and revolves around Sarny, a young slave girl who risks severe punishment when she is persuaded to learn to read by Nightjohn, a runaway slave who has just been recaptured. A commentator for Kirkus Reviews called Nightjohn "a searing picture of slavery" and an "unbearably vivid book. A Life Remembered, in which the former slave narrates her life in , at the ripe old age of ninety-four. Born a slave, Reeves learned cowboy skills such as riding and shooting while helping to defend the property of his master, a Texas rancher, from Indian attacks. In fact, Reeve became a legendary Federal Marshal, and was known for never drawing his gun first. Reeves becomes "a fully fleshed-out character whose story is made all the more satisfying by the truth behind it," concluded Laurie Slagenwhite in her School Library Journal review. This group has overrun the United States and is hatching Nazi-like purges of its enemies. A Publishers Weekly reviewer noted that the work will cause readers to "cheer on the good guys without ever fearing that they might not triumph in the end. A prolific author whose career has spanned over five decades, Paulsen follows a rigorous writing schedule. As he related to Sharon Miller Cindrich in Writer, he has worked "eighteen hours a day, seven days a week for about ten years. Writers like me are extinct. The dedication, obsession, the compulsion-driven need to be like me is just not done anymore. It is exactly this empathic power that has made him such a popular and respected author. Get this from a library! Track, enduro, and motocross--unless you fall over. [Gary Paulsen; Heinz Kluetmeier] -- A humorous commentary on different aspects of the sport of motorcycle riding with photographs of professional riders.

Is it time to get an enduro bike? You realize that your buds out ripping trails are riding more often than you and having just as much, if not more fun than those pounding laps at the track all day. Although your motocross bike will have no problem navigating most trail situations, there are a few things that can make life much easier for you. Some riders actually prefer using a motocross bike with some minor adjustments and re-enforcements for woods riding due to their lighter weights and more aggressive power delivery. Below you will find a list of components that will keep you riding more and requiring fewer tows back to the truck. This is just the beginning, we will get more in depth with each modification further down the road. Your first line of defence against the trees! Any bike will handle the trails with a good set of hand guards. The choice of hand guard is up to you but for most single track, I would recommend a set of full metal wrap around style guards bark busters. Eliminate the anxiety of running out of fuel. Get a higher capacity gas tank and go further away from the truck. Prevent costly damage to your engine cases with a good skid plate. These protect your engine cases and side covers from impact damage. In some cases they will even help you glide over these obstacles with less snagging. Available in plastic, aluminum and even carbon fibre. Nothing feels as nice as properly tuned woods suspension. Some may leave this for last as it may be the most expensive alteration. Your bike will likely need to be re-sprung and re-valved for enduro riding. If you are on a budget and need to start small, focus on the forks. These have the most impact on the handling of your bike in the woods. Your rads can be crushed from side impacts or impaled by projectiles. Keep them well protected. Your bike will fall on rocks eventually so make sure these are on your list. Be proactive and put them on while your rads are straight because they are a nightmare to install on a rads that are already bent. Smooth out the power delivery and improve your flow in the trails with a flywheel weight. A flywheel weight will help keep crank momentum up when letting off the gas thus keeping your engine from stalling and allowing you to lug the motor more like a four stroke. On a four stroke engine it will reduce engine breaking and make the power even more manageable. Spark arrestors and lower sound levels are required at most events. Get a silencer that keeps Smokey the bear off your back. These can be installed as a tip that mounts on the end of your existing silencer or you can replace your silencer all together. Check your local trails for sound regulations as well, now would be a good time to get a noise level friendly exhaust. Get fewer flats and more tire options. Your main advantage here is getting an extra inch of tire to help protect your rim from damage and pinch flats. With any of the above modifications you and your bike will be much happier about riding trails. Start with what will keep you safe, then what will protect your bike then finish with the performance enhancing pieces. Enjoy riding more by eliminating some worry. You will hit trees, you will crash and you will attempt hillclimbs you will not make it up.

Army, ; became sergeant. Attended Bemidji College, , and University of Colorado, Paulsen often writes from his first-hand knowledge of the outdoors, and from his experiences as a hunter, trapper, and even a dogsledder in the Alaska Iditarod race. Paulsen was born in Minnesota in , the son of first-generation Danish and Swedish parents. During childhood, he saw little of his father, who served in the military in Europe during World War II, nor his mother, who worked in a Chicago ammunition factory. The longest time I spent in one school was for about five months. School was a nightmare because I was unbelievably shy, and terrible at sports. I wound up skipping most of the ninth grade. Eventually Paulsen was sent again to live with relatives, and worked to support himself with jobs as a newspaperboy and as a pin-setter in a bowling alley. After the Army, he took extension courses to become a certified field engineer, and found work in the aerospace departments of the Bendix and Lockheed corporations. There it occurred to him that he might try and become a writer. What the hell, I am an engineering writer. After several hours of hard thinking, a way to earn came to me. All I had to do was go to work editing a magazine. Although it soon became apparent to his employers that he had no editorial experience, "they could see I was serious about wanting to learn, and they were willing to teach me," Paulsen once said. He spent nearly a year with the magazine, finding it "the best of all possible ways to learn about writing. It probably did more to improve my craft and ability than any other single event in my life. In little over a decade, working mainly out of northern Minnesota, he published nearly forty books and close to articles and stories for magazines. On a bet with a friend, he once wrote eleven articles and short stories inside four days and sold all of them. To burn off tension, he took long walks around his Minnesota farm during which, as he told Serdahely, he would "blow the hell out of a hillside" with a rifle. His prolific output was interrupted by a libel lawsuit brought against his young adult novel Winterkill. Paulsen eventually won the case, but, as he once observed, "the whole situation was so nasty and ugly that I stopped writing. I wanted nothing more to do with publishing and burned my bridges, so to speak. I was working a mile line mostly on foot, sometimes on skis, going out in the early morning and heading home at night. For food, we had a few beaver carcasses. I was initiated into this incredibly ancient and very beautiful bond, and it was as if everything that had happened to me before ceased to exist. He went so far as to enter the grueling mile Iditarod race in Alaska, an experience which later provided the basis for his award-winning novel Dogsong. His novel Tracker tells about a thirteen-year-old boy who faces his first season of deer hunting alone as his grandfather lies dying of cancer. Jobe in Language Arts praised the novel as "powerfully written," adding that " Paulsen explores with the reader the inner-most frustrations, hurts, and fears of the young boy. At a certain point, the animal senses death coming and accepts it. This acceptance of death is something I was trying to write about in Tracker. Dogsong, a Newbery Medal Honor book, is a rite-of-passage novel about a young Eskimo boy, Russel, who wishes to abandon the increasingly modern ways of his people. Through the guidance of a tribal elder, Russel learns to bow-hunt and dogsled, and eventually leads his own pack of dogs on a trip across Alaska and back. Like Russel in Dogsong, Brian is also transformed by the wilderness. Paulsen tells of a different kind of growing up in Harris and Me: Recreating his own childhood experience, Paulsen tells a tale of a young boy sent to his grandmother, a voyage of salvation for the youthful protagonist. In the first title, the boy comes from Chicago to the woods of Minnesota where his grandmother is working as a cook for road builders. Escaping the alcoholism at home, he finds love and renewal in the simple surroundings and in nature. Looking at life as a literal gem, he can turn said gem, gazing at a new facet, a new angle of approach for old stories, mining and re-mining his own lode of stories endlessly. In another critically successful book, Paulsen examines the horrors and brutality of slavery. The historically based Nightjohn is set in the nineteenth-century South and revolves around Sarny, a young slave girl who risks severe punishment when she is persuaded to learn to read by Nightjohn, a runaway slave who has just been recaptured. A commentator for Kirkus Reviews called Nightjohn "a searing picture of slavery" and an "unbearably vivid book. A Life Remembered, in which the former slave narrates her life in from the ripe old age of ninety-four. A focal point of her story is the fact that she learned to read: Adults created the mess which we are struggling to outlive. Adults have their minds set. Memories of a Sixteenth Summer, and Guts: The True Stories behind Hatchet and the Brian Books, Paulsen recounts stories from his own life, many of which he previously fictionalized in his young adult books. In awarding the writer the Margaret A. Edwards Award, the award committee, as noted in School Library Journal, commented on this very trait: Radio Caper, illustrated by John Asquith, Raintree,

Full of Hot Air: He is best known for writing down the coming of age stories often depicting the wilderness. During his writing career, he has penned down over books and an equal number of short stories and magazine articles. Gary has also scripted several few plays mainly for the teenagers. For his excellent contribution to writing teen novels throughout his life, he awarded with the Margaret Edwards Award in the year by the American Library Association. Gary was born in an extended family and has a couple of siblings. Due to the national duties of his father, Gary was not able to see him until the age of 7. His upbringing was done mostly by his aunts, grandmother and several relatives. When he was 7 years old, he and his mother went to the Philippines to be with his father and stayed there for a couple of years. After returning back to Minnesota, Gary ran away from his house and joined a carnival when he was 14 years old. Gary says that he was not a dedicated student in his school days, but had developed a passion towards reading books at a very young age. It all started when he was given a novel by a librarian along with his library card to read. When he ran away from his home and joined a carnival, he began traveling to different places with the group. This helped him to develop a liking for adventure. After that, he began indulging in different activities like doing rigorous chores on the farms during a youthful summer, working as a construction worker, an engineer, a truck driver, a ranch hand, a sailor. He also took part in the mile dog race in Alaska race for two rounds. These activities allowed author Gary Paulsen to have enough sources from which he could develop interesting stories. As of today, he lives happily along with his beloved wife named Ruth Paulsen in his house situated in New Mexico. The couple often divided their time between staying at home together and boating in the Pacific. During his writing career, author Gary Paulsen has written a total of 5 novel series, all of which are quite successful. They are published between the years and The plot of this novel is set in Canada and depicts the life story of the main character named Brian Robenson. In the opening sequence of the plot of the novel, it is shown that Brian Robenson gets stranded in the wilderness of Canada following a plane crash. In order to survive and get back to his normal life, Brian uses his hatchet and his instincts. He shows a great determination and comes out of his misery after saying alive in the wilderness for 54 days of difficulty. In the latest edition of the novel, author Gary Paulsen has added a sidebar commentary by himself and a new introduction. These additions were specifically written for the latest volume of the novel. The descriptions in the plot of the novel are complemented by the detailed pen and ink illustrations by Drew Willis. They are very much interesting and help to add a new dimension to the latest edition of the novel. Author Gary believes that the new additions in the book will be treasured by its fans and by the readers who will be encountering the unforgettable journey of Brian Robenson for the very first time. It was published by the Laurel Leaf Library publishing house in the year This novel depicts the life of the main character named Brian Robenson two years ahead of the first novel. Two years before, he was involved in a plane crash and was stranded in the wilderness of Canada alone. He had to strive for 54 days and came out alive with the help of his instincts and a small hatchet. After surviving those difficult days, Brain hopes of never encountering them again. But, he asked by the government to go back to the wilderness and perform his survival tasks again so that it can help the military and the astronauts to learn his survival techniques and use them in difficult situations. However, he will not be going alone this time. A government psychologist named Derek Holtzer will accompany him in the wilderness. During the task, they get stuck in a freak storm due to which Derek gets hit by a lightening, thereby falling into coma. Even their radio transmitter becomes dead. Seeing the condition of Derek Brian becomes afraid. He realizes that he needs to take him to a doctor or else he will die of dehydration. Their only hope lies in building a raft and transporting to a trading post a miles down the river. Bryan Dano 0 Comments Almost every sport has a language. The same goes through with motocross; they also have their own. There are a lot of special words in the motocross terminology dictionary and they just keep on adding up. Block Pass â€” when a racer passes another racer in a corner or making them slow down and lose momentum. Oftentimes, a contact is made by the rider intending for the opponent to stumble or fall. Brake Check â€” used mainly for throwing off momentum. The rider in the lead momentarily brakes, usually in the corner, in hopes for the rider behind to do the same. Brraaap â€” a universal term, moto and even noise that may be used in multiple situations. It can tell a story, end a conversation and describe actions. Derived from the fast sound of a 2 stroke bike. Cased â€” Casing a jump means to come up short and landing on the backside of the landing. A technique not suitable to do on a triple. Clapped Out â€” a term for bikes that is a few years old and looks like it has not been maintained for a long time. The kind of bikes that should be towed whenever seen on the street. Probably for several reasons. Like when the bikes where the one being carried out of the track or the rider were being carried into the hospital. Oh, and it is also indicated next to your name on the result sheet in case of the two examples above happened. Goon Riding â€” Easy description? LOL Holeshoot â€” Once the gate drops and the riders take off, the first one to the first corner gets the holeshoot. Lapper â€” is someone during the race that is a full lap down from the leader or someone else. Maybe because someone is slow to get back up or has fallen. Pinned â€” basically means Going full throttle Roosted â€” The shower of debris that shoots up and back from the rear tire. Just like the tail of the rooster Rutted â€” indicated that a part of the track is relatively soft. Scrub â€” describes the rider staying low while jumping an obstacle. The less time in air means that lesser time is in midst between the bike and the ground allowing for faster time moving forward. Seat Bounce â€” to get more lift off the face is usually a viable yet advanced option for clearing the gap effortlessly. It involves sitting down while taking off from the lip of a jump to compress the suspension and help bounce you off of the takeoff. A rider on the track who could use some training on form and technique. When a rider jumps, it is a huge factor that it will not end up well. Step Up â€” usually some sort of double with the landing actually higher than the takeoff. Supermini â€” a class designation which includes the fasted kids that are still on minibikes. Tearoffsâ€” are individually staked sheets of thin plastic that go over your goggles. When dirt hits your goggles, you ust tear of one sheet to clear your vision. Triple â€” is a jump with three options. They are usually for more skilled riders. Whip â€” Guiding the bike, while airborne, so that it lies flat. Whoops â€” A row of dirt mounds or moguls. The fastest way through these are to enter with enough speed to skip along the tops of the whoops. Yard Sale â€” is when the bike crashed and flipped hard enough to have the different parts to break off.
