Horace Walpole, a son of the politician Robert Walpole, rented the cottage in and subsequently bought it. Walpole did not follow the conventional eighteenth-century fashion of classical building, but sought his inspiration in medieval styles, creating a notable early example of neo-Gothic architecture. Some of his contemporaries imitated his design and so this house and the idea it embodied take their place in the history of architecture as "Strawberry Hill Gothic". By the end of the 20th century, Strawberry Hill House had fallen into a state of disrepair, with the cost of reversing its condition too substantial for the College to meet. The Grade One listed building had been registered as a building at risk by English Heritage now Historic England in , and in August the Strawberry Hill Trust was formed with a mission to restore the building and open it to a wider public. The shortfall was finally met in and in July of that year the lease was transferred from the Catholic Education Service to the Trust. It was restored in as a chapel to include a shrine of the Virgin Mary, [5] with new murals and stained glass by Harry Clarke. The stained glass that Walpole housed within it is now at its original home [6] at Bexhill Church, Sussex. A legal trust created on 16 July in connection with this property and its use as a training college for Catholic schoolmasters was confirmed in perpetuity. John Melville Glennie, in The college opened with six adult male students who had begun their training at the novitiate of the Brothers of Christian Instruction. It was expected that students would join the teaching religious order, however in , in response to a shortage of suitably qualified candidates, the decision was taken to admit lay students to the College. In , additional accommodation was provided for 50 lay students, and by only lay students were attending the college. With the appointment of the fourth principal, Father William Byrne CM in , the association of the College with the Congregation of the Mission usually known as the Vincentians commenced. This inaugurated a period of change and augmentation, seen in the increase in staff and student numbers, the introduction of the office of Dean , and the extension of the college premises made possible by funding from the Catholic Education Council. At the same time the college was concerned with adjusting to the requirements of the Education Acts of 1944 and their effect on the development of elementary education. The college magazine, The Simmarian, began a new series in Originally in manuscript form, it became a printed paper in and is still published today. Early 20th century[edit] By there were resident students at the college. The college moved to its Strawberry Hill site in despite the extensive new buildings, designed by S. Pugin-Powell, being at that point incomplete. It was not until June that the latter were officially opened. The new site provided accommodation for students, with students altogether. The majority of students were from England and Wales and entered according to Board of Education regulations. There were also a number of private students from onwards, including approximately 40 coming annually from Northern Ireland, as well as students from Malta, and brothers from England and Wales. Private students lived in accommodation separate from the college. Prior to the Certificate of Education course and examinations were jointly controlled by the Board of Education and individual training colleges. With the introduction of a new scheme for London teacher training colleges, the Board of Education retained its inspectorship functions, but delegated its authority over the courses and examination to the University of London. This group was jointly responsible with UCL for drawing up the syllabuses of the courses taught at the colleges, while the final examinations were designed to qualify students for the Certificate of Education awarded by the University of London. To direct the scheme, the Training College Delagacy was established, composed of representatives of the university, the teacher training colleges, religious denominations and local authorities. At the same time a one-year colonial course was established at the college to train Priests and Brothers destined to join overseas missions. In , responsibility for this course was transferred to the Jesuits. In response to the increasing demand for teachers, it was agreed in to expand the college to places. By , there were 1, students. In the first students of the college graduated with degrees from the University of Surrey. With the retirement of Fr. During and existing sports facilities were refurbished and an additional complex was added. David Weir won quadruple gold in the m, m, m and Marathon at the Summer Paralympics. Medallists at the Games include distance runner and alumnus Mo Farah.
