The platform included promoting the decriminalization of drugs for personal use only, not trafficking, as he disapproved of profiteering, tearing up the streets and turning them into grassy pedestrian malls, banning any building so tall as to obscure the view of the mountains, disarming all police forces, and renaming Aspen "Fat City" to deter investors. Thompson Candidate for Sheriff. The Republican candidate agreed to withdraw a few days before the election in order to consolidate the anti-Thompson votes, in return for the Democrats withdrawing their candidate for county commissioner. Thompson later remarked that the Rolling Stone article mobilized his opposition far more than his supporters. For that article, editor Warren Hinckle paired Thompson with illustrator Ralph Steadman, who drew expressionist illustrations with lipstick and eyeliner. Thompson and Steadman collaborated regularly after that. Although it was not widely read, the article was the first to use the techniques of Gonzo journalism, a style Thompson would later employ in almost every literary endeavor. The manic first-person subjectivity of the story was reportedly the result of sheer desperation; he was facing a looming deadline and started sending the magazine pages ripped out of his notebook. Cardoso first met Thompson on a bus full of journalists covering the New Hampshire primary. If this is a start, keep rolling. Horatio Alger gone mad on drugs in Las Vegas. Finding it difficult to talk in the racially tense atmosphere of Los Angeles, Thompson and Acosta decided to travel to Las Vegas, and take advantage of an assignment by Sports Illustrated to write a word photograph caption on the Mint motorcycle race held there. What was to be a short caption quickly grew into something else entirely. Thompson first submitted to Sports Illustrated a manuscript of 2, words, which was, as he later wrote, "aggressively rejected. It is written as a first-person account by a journalist named Raoul Duke on a trip to Las Vegas with Dr. During the trip, Duke and his companion always referred to as "my attorney" become sidetracked by a search for the American Dream, with "two bags of grass, seventy-five pellets of mescaline, five sheets of high-powered blotter acid, a salt shaker half full of cocaine, and a whole galaxy of multi-colored uppers, downers, screamers, laughers Thompson was an early supporter of McGovern and wrote unflattering coverage of the rival campaigns in the increasingly widely read Rolling Stone. Thompson went on to become a fierce critic of Nixon, both during and after his presidency. He was a swine of a man and a jabbering dupe of a president. He missed the match while intoxicated at his hotel, and did not submit a story to the magazine. As Wenner put it to the film critic Roger Ebert in the documentary Gonzo: The Life and Work of Dr. Thompson arrived in Saigon just as South Vietnam was collapsing and as other journalists were leaving the country. Again, Wenner pulled the plug on the project. Beginning with The Great Shark Hunt in and ending with Better Than Sex in, the series is largely a collection of rare newspaper and magazine pieces from the pre-gonzo period, along with almost all of his Rolling Stone pieces. Starting in about, Thompson became more reclusive. He would often retreat to his compound in Woody Creek, rejecting projects assignments or failing to complete them. Despite a lack of new material, Wenner kept Thompson on the Rolling Stone masthead as chief of the "National Affairs Desk", a position he would hold until his death. In Thompson divorced wife Sandra Conklin. Extensively illustrated by Ralph Steadman, the piece first appeared in Running magazine in as "The Charge of the Weird Brigade" and was excerpted in Playboy. In Thompson accepted an advance to write about "couples pornography" for Playboy. The experience evolved into an as-yet-unpublished novel tentatively entitled The Night Manager. Thompson next accepted a role as weekly media columnist and critic for The San Francisco Examiner. The position was arranged by former editor and fellow Examiner columnist Warren Hinckle. The next week it would be incisive political analysis of the highest order. Songs of the Doomed: More Notes on the Death of the American Dream, a collection of autobiographical reminiscences, articles and previously unpublished material. It was briefly excerpted in Rolling Stone in, and Thompson himself described it as "He falls in love and gets in even more trouble than he was in the sex theater in San Francisco". Thompson continued to publish irregularly in Rolling Stone, ultimately contributing 17 pieces to the magazine between and Rather than traveling the campaign trail as he had done in previous presidential elections, Thompson monitored the proceedings on cable television; Better Than Sex: Confessions of a Political Junkie, his account of the presidential campaign, is composed of reactive faxes to Rolling Stone. Fear and Loathing, Campaign ", a brief account of the presidential election in which he compared the outcome of the Bush v. Gore court case to the Reichstag fire and formally endorsed Senator John Kerry , a longtime friend, for president. The same year, an early novel The Rum Diary was published, as were the two volumes of collected letters. Thompson finished his journalism career in the same way it had begun: From until his death in , he wrote a weekly column for ESPN. Thompson married assistant Anita Bejmuk on April 23, Death[ edit ] At 5: His son Juan, daughter-in-law Jennifer, and grandson were visiting for the weekend. His wife Anita, who was at the Aspen Club, was on the phone with him as he cocked the gun. Anita said she mistook the cocking of the gun for the sound of his typewriter keys and hung up as he fired. Will and Jennifer were in the next room when they heard the gunshot, but mistook the sound for a book falling and did not check on Thompson immediately. He was also upset over his advancing age and chronic medical problems, including a hip replacement; he would frequently mutter "This kid is getting old. That is 17 years past I am always bitchy. You are getting Greedy. I think that the truth of what rings through all his writing is that he meant what he said. He could never stand being bored. The plans for the monument were initially drawn by Thompson and Steadman, and were shown as part of an Omnibus program on the BBC titled Fear and Loathing in Gonzovision
