It might also have been phrased like this: Let me share something very important with you: Anyone who is able to break loose and find their own way should be treated with suspicion. It is not defined by facts. It is determined by the collective perception of unremarkably average people. They are the people in the Matrix who have taken the blue pill. Naturally, I have a different perspective from those who talk about the real world. No one is better than you. Short of being enslaved, no one can get away with telling you what to do without you accepting it. The best years of our lives are neither behind us nor ahead of us. No need to pack the Lonely Planet or plan much of anything before you go. They say pretty much the same thing that has always been said throughout history about unrealistic ideas. You know, those notions about how women should have the same rights as men, human beings should not be bought and sold, lay people should have access to religious texts, criminals should be rehabilitated instead of simply put to death, and so on. All of those crazy, unrealistic ideas that could never work in the Real World. Be careful when you choose to fight back, because people who hold these beliefs are like caged animals. In the long run you are smarter, stronger, and have more stamina than them, but in the short run, you might get bitten if you put your hand in the cage. When animals or small-minded people feel threatened, they tend to lash out at whoever is nearby. If you do fight back carefully, the response that comes to mind is something like this: However, not all of us are sleepwalkers. Some of us are alive. Some of us have not given up on the unrealistic. Some of us have taken the red pill. Joseph Campbell understood this alternative years ago when he wrote about the meaning of life: What we seek is an experience of being alive. The living world gives us yet another reason to be happy about the world falling apart around us. In the context of losing wealth and job security, more people are choosing to seek the experience of being alive. Some certainly not all are realizing that the real world has failed them, and that they need to find another way to make it now that the curtain has been lifted. You can help people wake up from sleepwalking and welcome them to the living world.

Andrew Gavin Marshall Part 1: Meet the Global Corporate Supra-Government How have your personal finances been since the global economic crisis began in ? Are you in debt? Are you below the poverty line? Has your standard of living stagnated or declined? In , as bank profits in the United States and Europe were increasing, the very same banks recording billions in quarterly profits were announcing cuts to thousands of jobs. Thus, not only are they able to increase quarterly profits, but they are able to ensure that the crisis continues and deepens by perpetuating the problems that created it and profiting along the way. Reports over the summer of suggested that global corporate profits were lagging due to the economic crisis in Europe. After all, people are still struggling, more than ever in recent history; unemployment is high, job losses soar, poverty spreads and insecurity reigns supreme. Compared to previous economic crises, the situation is much worse than ever before. As the study noted: As profits soared, not only at multinational corporations, but at the major banks which caused the crisis in the first place, they continued to undertake massive layoffs. The Northeastern University report on corporate profits also noted that one of the main causes of the crisis in the first place was the relationship between increased corporate profits and decreased worker wages and benefits. Thus, without a hint of irony, the same things that created the crisis are exacerbated and made worse after the crisis: In late , worker wages as a total of U. GDP reached an all-time low, while corporate profits reached an all-time high. In fact, late saw corporate profits increase by Further, CEO pay has also been rising 27 times faster than worker pay since Banks were making profits not seen since , just before the financial crisis struck. Part of the reason for increased bank profits had to do with dramatic cuts in jobs and sales of assets. In , financial institutions in the United States employed over 2. In December of , bank profits increased by 9.
