Ask students to brainstorm words, terms, or phrases they associate with a topic. The teacher and students record these associations in the K column of their charts. This is done until students run out of ideas. K Column Suggestions Have questions ready to help students brainstorm their ideas. Encourage students to explain their associations. This is especially important for those associations that are vague or unusual. The teacher and students record these questions in the W column of their charts. This is done until students run out of ideas for questions. If students respond with statements, turn them into questions before recording them in the W column. W Column Suggestions Ask an alternative question for generating ideas for the W column. Be sure not to add too many of your own questions, however. The majority of the questions in the W column should be student-generated. Have students read the text and fill out the L column of their charts. Students should look for the answers to the questions in their W column. Students can fill out their L columns either during or after reading. L Column Suggestions In addition to answering the W column questions, encourage students to write in the L column anything they found especially interesting. To distinguish between the answers to their questions and the ideas they found interesting, have students code the information in their L columns. For example, they can put a check mark next to the information that answers questions from the K column. And they can put a star next to ideas that they found interesting. Have students consult other resources to find out the answers to questions that were not answered in the text. Discuss the information that students recorded in the L column. A teaching model that develops active reading of expository text. Example Following is an example of a completed K-W-L chart that students might complete if they were reading a text about gravity.

2: How to Know What You Want in Life (with Pictures) - wikiHow

"I Want You to Know" is a song by Russian-German music producer Zedd, featuring vocals from American singer Selena Gomez from the former's second studio album, True Colors (). It was written by Zedd, OneRepublic 's frontman Ryan Tedder, and KDrew.

Being clear about what you desire and need to feel happier is so important because it is one of the first steps towards a better life filled with self esteem! If you are still trying to decide what it is you truly want in life, then here are some great questions to ask yourself: What interests excite you the most? Think about what your real passion and desire is. Remember the times when you were really interested and excited by something you were doing. Think about why you enjoyed it so much. What is it about the activity that you love? Or is where you did it? It probably makes you feel good to remember. Choosing to do what you like is good for your self esteem and is the key to your happiness. What are you biggest successes in life? No matter how small, list your most important achievements. This will raise your confidence and help you feel better about yourself. Acknowledging your successes is a good place to start because it highlights your talents and strengths and can guide you to where you need to go next. Giving yourself credit for even the simplest of accomplishments can help you feel better and set you up for bigger and better accomplishments. If anything were possible, what would you choose to do and what would you want your life to be like? A very big life-changing question but one which will enable you to start dreaming and imagining the possibilities. If you wish to improve your life, then first you must imagine what is possible. Forget the limits you believe hold you back or stop you, most of these are in your mind and not real limitations. You need to dream big to achieve big. So, if your life were a book and you were the author, how would you want the story to go? What are your goals? Anything that comes to mind write it out as a goal. If you only have two goals and achieve half that is only one success, so go for it! At the end of the day, whether you believe it right now or not, your mind is the only thing standing between you and your dreams. See this page for more about how to create goals. It is important to have a model, someone to look up to. This will enable you to understand that you CAN overcome problems and do what seems impossible , as others have before. Also, you can also understand more about yourself and the values you have because you can see them in the person you have chosen. Why did you choose that person? Answer this and you will discover more about who and what you want to be. How will you commit to getting everything you want? This is the biggie! If you have answered the above life questions then you cannot just sit there, you have to take action. You need a positive attitude. One of the biggest problems is fear. You have to be strong and have support to fight this when doubt arrives, as it will. How far will you go if things get tough? Who can you tell about your plans? Telling someone you can rely on is important. If that person is helpful and supportive they will also hold you to your promises. A friend is priceless in helping you commit to your future. If your answer is YES, then I highly recommend you get this excellent self-hypnosis program: It requires time to answer each of these questions. Be honest with yourself and go for it! Before you leave this page, if you found it helpful please share it with someone. Leave a comment below and tell me what you think about the ideas here and what you will do to change your life.

If you don't know what you really want in life, you're not alone. Thousands, if not millions, of people wander the earth every day without a quest. If you don't want to spend your life wandering aimlessly, you can use the following 7 tips to find out exactly what you want in life.

When I was 27, I started escorting. I desperately wanted to feel part of a contributing member of society. There are lots of reasons someone might see an escort. Many clients are too busy with work to settle down but are lonely, crave intimacy and are even depressed. Often the clients who contact me are older cisgender white men. This is probably the group of people you think of as johns: In fact, about 50 percent of my clients are people of color, and many are around my age. Because of the way society is set up, this generally leaves older cis white men at an advantage. As a disabled woman who has found empowerment in this industry, I know that there are many other sex workers who are marginalized â€” people who are neuro-atypical, of color, queer â€” and can relate to clients like themselves who want a better quality of life. If we made seeing a sex worker more inclusive, that would also help destigmatize sex work in society, because the more people who see that they can benefit from our services, the more society will see us as people rather than a stock photo. It makes me wonder why anyone would think someone seeing a sex worker is a loser. My clients are everyday people who just want to feel desired as we all do. Taylor Goode is a client-turned-escort who started in this business because he saw that straight women needed to hire sex workers too. Intimacy is a need, no matter who you are. And while no one is entitled to sex, more people should know that seeing a sex worker is available to them. I asked other sex workers on Twitter how they thought we could make our services more inclusive. A lot of people said that they agree that sexual empowerment should be for everyone, not just cis white men. As the discussion went on, someone said that seeing a sex worker should be covered by health care insurance because intimacy is part of sexual health. It can be hard to give ourselves permission to seek out what we desire. But perhaps if more people had the confidence of cis white men, they would feel more comfortable hiring a sex worker like any other service. In the meantime, please know that a lot of us are waiting for you with open, nonjudgmental arms.

I wish I am strong enough to concentrate on one single thing and do everything to be the best at it. I believe it is the only way of attaining something. My problem is that the variety of decisions make my head spin. For some of my clients, they feel they are entering a period of their life where they should have clarity in what they want to do. Hence, not knowing what they want to do makes them feel frustrated. They feel that if they can quickly discover what they want to do, they can get started on it right away, rather than waste time doing seemingly unrelated things. To get an idea of what you want to do, you have to first base it off a reference point. This reference point is based on your past experiences. However, you have never used a mobile phone in your life. Sit at home and mull over what mobile phone you should buy, waiting for the answer would pop in at some point. OR Get to know what a mobile phone is. Go out there and explore the different mobile phones available. Which option will help you make progress in your dilemma? Which option will give you new insights, new information, and new data points for you to base your decision on? Which option is a more reliable method to get you what you want? If you are thinking option 2, we are thinking the same thing. The fog in your mind For you to know what you want to do, you have to have some kind of experience you can refer to. The fog will remain as long as you stay still. To clear out the fog, you need to explore. You need to get out there and start trying out different things. You need to gain experience, to pick up new knowledge, to get into new situations. By building up as many of these experiences as possible, you create a baseline reference point in your mind. How I discovered what I truly want to do in life One of the key things that helped me discover my purpose back in was because I went all out in all my goal pursuits and in pursuing my interests before that. All I knew as a kid was I wanted to make the best out of my life and be a person of value to the society, and that meant doing my best and achieving my highest potential. And that was what I did. I went all out to pursue my goals. I would put my heart and soul in everything I did. Whatever my goals were, from achievement goals, to academia goals, to business goals I had a graphic design business last time, and ran a network of successful internet sites back when I was in secondary school , I would set my eyes on the top prize and go all out for them. I never held back. Every step of the journey, I learned something new about the world and myself. I grew as a person, and I became more self-aware. I realized that things I thought were important to me were actually not what I wanted. I came to realizations I never saw coming. I would never have realized any single one of these things if I had never been fervent in pursuing my growth, my goals and interests. With the kind of energy I was putting in my pursuits, it exposed me to a good spectrum of different contexts and experiences. It was then a matter of time before I finally realized what I wanted to do. Breadth and Depth Hence, the key to know what you want to do is to get out there and gain as much experience as you can – both 1 Breadth of experiences 2 Depth of experiences. Breadth of experiences refers to the variety of things you do. The more new things you try, the greater the breadth of experiences you build up. Depth of experiences refers to the intensity of how much you have done something. Whereas if you have intensely strove to be the top engineer, studying top engineers, taking on all new projects that emerge and reading the best engineering texts, your depth of experience is going to be way more in comparison. The depth of your experiences in the subject can increase by an increased time spent on it, as well as just increasing your focus and energy when you are doing it. Where to start off? At this point you must be wondering where to start first, since there are so many different possibilities. My recommendation will be to start off by doing the things you already have some interest in. Advertisement Take out a piece of pen and paper. For the next 30 minutes, please write out a list of all the things you have always wanted to try, but have never tried. Also, write down the things you would want to try today. After you are done, look back at the list. What are the things you are interested to try today? It can be a few, it can be some, it can even be all. What is the thing you want to try out first? Label that as number 1. Then, move on to the thing you want to try next. Label that as number 2. And so on and so forth, until you get to the very last item you circled. How can you start trying the first few items you circled? Some of you may experience fear trying new things. You can continue what you are currently doing and try out something new, all at the same time. Just start off with little steps. Volunteering at a related organization. Consulting someone who is experienced in this area. Reading up on it. Draw up a plan to get working on the items on your list. Get up close with personal. Go ahead and try everything you want. Regroup periodically by introspecting and checking if you are moving in the right track. And as you gain a critical mass of experiences – both the breadth and the depth, the answer will be clear to you. Soak in the life you have now and appreciate everything you get to experience, good or bad, ups or downs. I respect your privacy. Unsubscribe whenever you want. Read my Privacy Policy. 5: What I Want You to Know - Single by JKD on iTunes

What I Want You to Know - Single This is a fantastic song! Great melody, heart felt lyrics, very talented instrumental composition. JKD wrote and produced this song and it is remarkable!

There is no other way to interpret my situation; without my gun, I would not be able to sit here, alive and breathing, and thinking of ways to share the importance of smart gun ownership with you. I was violently attacked in my car by a man on January 26, My attacker mistakenly perceived me as weak and stalked me into an elevator, which took me on the slowest and scariest thirteen second ride of my life. I correctly listened to my instincts; I had a feeling that my life was in danger in that elevator and prepared myself mentally for what was potentially to come. I ran to my car in an attempt to escape and, before I could even get my entire body in my car, I was tackled by my attacker. There is nothing further from the truth. The night I was attacked, I fought like hell for my life before reaching for my gun. I kicked, I screamed, I had all ten fingernails ripped off and bloodied from scratching and trying to fight my way out of a literal life and death situation. Ultimately, I accessed my gun, shot my attacker multiple times, and saved my life. He will be spending years in prison for what he did to me. Using a gun in self-protection is not a decision one makes lightly; in fact, I never dreamed that I would be forced into a situation where I would have to do so. However, I also never imagined such evil existing in the world so that I would be powerless, wounded, on my back and unable to physically force my attacker off of me. I owned a gun and had been trained on how to use it. I know how to safely carry and that a gun is a serious and significant weapon; it is not to be used carelessly. Naysayers and people with opposing opinions may try to undermine my situation with hypotheticals. I cannot answer these questions. All I can do is tell the facts of my story and the true account of how I saved my own life. What I want you to know on Gun Awareness Day is that a gun in the hands of a potential victim is not improperly placed; it can be the only thing keeping her from being brutally raped and murdered. Without my gun, I would not be alive today. Be safe at all times. Be aware of your surroundings. Always be able to protect yourself. Refuse to be a victim, and instead be a fighter and a survivor. Kristi McMains is a private attorney, specializing in health law. After sustaining significant health injuries from the attack, she moved back home to Indiana to be near her family.

Reach out to the National Suicide Prevention Lifeline at <https://www.suicidepreventionlifeline.org/> Suicide is a subject many are afraid to talk about or even acknowledge. But how do we not talk about one of the leading causes of death? Each year, suicides claim the lives of 44,000 people in the United States alone. This is why we need to better understand it and do our very best to get people the help they need in their darkest moments. One way to do this? We asked people in our Mental Health Awareness community on Facebook who have attempted or otherwise been affected by suicide: What do you wish others knew about your experience? Here are their responses: I make the decision every day to carry on and take it just one step at a time. She went through years of blaming herself He was not a coward. In fact, he did what he did to spare the people he loved. How terrible it actually is to feel that way. To go against your survival instincts and go ahead with any action to end your life, and to spare what you perceive is the burden you are putting on everyone else, actually takes a whole lot of courage. I want people to know inside my head is a very sad place. The bigger the lie, the more you are worth it. You may not feel it, but you are loved by someone. For me, it was a quiet little voice that said: It causes so much pain, and anxiety, and fear for our families. We never know what guilt our loved ones are holding on to. I promise again, it will get better! You pull up the flower, not realizing the roots are deep and have spread far. You survive, but the call of the void never quite goes away. But you learn to not answer it. If you or someone you know is considering suicide, help is out there. If someone is at immediate risk of self-harm, call or your local emergency number and stay with them until help arrives. Responses have been edited for length and clarity.
