3: What Will You Be When You Grow Up?

Before you get started moving forward with your career, it's a good idea to take some time to learn more about yourself as a person. To find out which job is suitable for you, first you need to find out exactly who you are.

I want to drive one all by myself when I am older. He dreams about trains. He reads about trains. He draws pictures of trains. He is sure this is what he will do. Lucy, aged seven, wants to be a zookeeper. She wants to look after them. She has drawn a picture of her dream. No matter that right now she is still in primary school, reading and counting and writing when the teacher says so. X Factor here she comes. She demonstrates in felt tip. The rest of her class do the same. Farmer, artist, footballer, her classmates decide. They draw themselves in the future, entertaining audiences, saving lives, nurturing minds. Meanwhile, on the office floor and in the sales room, willing past the hours between clocking on and knocking off, things have turned grey. Dreams have been crushed to dust. As the recession rolls on, scared workers with bills to pay and mortgages on their minds reason: At a time when it is hard for adults to summon the freedom to dream, children are setting an example. As our young artists from Walbottle Village primary school, Newcastle upon Tyne, show, they dream freely. Redundancy is not in their vocabulary. In place, they possess a healthy dose of imagination. "I like animals and want to be one," says Bethany, five. "I think we need to keep that ambition going. But as they support their children in reaching for their very different dream careers, one generation on, parents said they rated job satisfaction and happiness as more than twice as important as wealth. Next in the top 10 are footballer, fireman and actor followed by policeman, dancer and hairdresser. Dreams, though, can be expensive to pursue. But perhaps an even greater cost – not necessarily measured in monetary terms – could be attached to the reverse; not pursuing dreams. Kieron, abandoning all enthusiasm for a job with travel, adventure and people, takes a job in an office – temporarily – to pay the bills. He stays for 25 years and gets used to the salary, occasionally wondering what happened. Fizz is enthusiasm for your work, being absorbed, concentrating intently and not noticing an hour pass, rather than watching the clock. For some workers who realise they are nowhere near their dream, knowing what it looks like is the problem. Childhood dreams are not necessarily an indicator of what you will want to do as an adult, says Yeung otherwise there would be far more air hostesses. It is useful, though, to look back at your life from teenager onwards and consider what you enjoy doing, he says. He cites the example of someone who loves fixing things, or someone who is great at chatting to people and socialising. He would ask them how much of this their job includes. If what they enjoy doing does not form any aspect of their work, it might be time for change. Posing such challenging questions in a time of economic uncertainty may lack appeal. Evidence suggests the majority of workers shy away from such soul-searching, and decide instead that no dream in particular will do. We are a "nation of career drifters", analysis by workplace consultancy CHA shows. But the financial crisis has altered roles – for the worse – for many workers. And a large percentage who would not previously have done so are questioning how well suited their jobs are to them. Whereas talk two years or even 12 months ago might have been of career progression, workers are now widely complaining of career regression, never mind just standing still. Research published last month by international charity VSO shows that more than 10 million workers in Britain feel they are "stagnating" professionally. One fifth of workers said they were considering a previously unplanned change in professional direction. Half said there were limited opportunities to get promoted in their current job and almost half said the recession had reduced their chances of developing their career. Perhaps the time is exactly right to pinpoint and leap for dreams. Talk to people, read useful material. But while in your current job there are three steps you can take. First, figure out what is important and what would make you happy. Second, decide if your dream job is really for you – it might not be in reality. Network in that industry, find out what the role actually involves. Dreams are hard to grasp at the best of times. What did you dream of doing? What do you want to be? Why not turn it over and draw on it, before the dream fades.

4: Feeling Too Tall or Too Short

When you grow up, you can also be a mom or dad. Have you thought about the kind of mom or dad you'd want to be? Watch the parents around you to see what you want to do when you're a parent.

It might be girls feeling too tall and boys feeling too short. In other words, your body grows on its own schedule. For kids concerned about their height, there are two big questions: When will I grow taller or stop growing? How tall will I be? Kids get taller more quickly during growth spurts, times when their bodies grow fast – as much as 4 inches or more in a year during puberty, for example! When Does Height Happen? Your biggest growth spurt happened when you were a baby. In that first year of life, you grew about 10 inches as you got bigger and stronger. Uh, oh – we can see your ankles! After babyhood, the next big growth spurt for kids comes during puberty, a time of many changes when boys and girls grow bigger and start to look more like adult men and women. Puberty starts at different ages for different kids and it is a process that takes a couple of years. So the getting taller part will happen at different ages, depending on the kid, and whether he or she is a boy or a girl. In general, puberty starts: So that means girls who start puberty the latest will still be getting taller in their mid-teens. For boys, the latest to reach puberty will still be getting taller into their late teens. A few of these boys may grow taller even into their early twenties! How Tall Will I Be? You might want to know how tall you will be. Will you be nose to nose with your mom or dad someday? Look at your parents and the other adult members of your family. How tall are they? But you could be taller or shorter, too. Boy, there are a lot of "buts" when it comes to height! Genes tell your body how to grow and determine lots of things, including how tall you are. If you have brothers and sisters, you know this is true. Brothers and sisters can look very different even though you have the same parents. Even identical twins can end up being different heights! Height-Related Worries Here are some things some short or tall kids might have to deal with: This one is upsetting. Sometimes, you will be allowed to ride with an adult, so try to have one handy. You still have to use a booster seat in the car. The seats are meant to position the seat belt properly in case of a crash. On the plus side, sitting higher makes it easier to see and might help if you get carsick and need to keep looking out the window. This can make a girl feel awkward, especially when it comes time to be paired up, like at a school dance. Eventually, this evens out, but it takes a little while because many girls have their growth spurts before the boys do. Someone teases you about being too tall or too short. This kind of teasing is the worst. As with most teasing, try not to let it bother you. If you are still worried about your height, talk to your parents and your doctor. But you can do something right now: Eat healthy and take care of yourself. Just stick to a healthy diet if you want to be the tallest you can be! As they get older, most kids learn to feel comfortable with their height, whether they turn out tall, short, or somewhere in between.
