Overview You probably know what to expect during your period: So when you spot something abnormal, such as brown discharge or dark brown blood, you may be concerned. Every woman experiences menstruation differently. Your cycle might run like clockwork, with few cramps and short periods. Other women may not be able to get out of bed for the first few days of their period, bleed very heavily, and never know how long it will last once it arrives. Even if you have a regular, predictable period, you may notice variation from month to month. Is brown blood normal? In most cases, brown blood during your period is normal. The color and consistency of blood can change throughout your menstrual cycle. It may be thin and watery one day, and thick and clumpy the next. It may be bright red or brown, heavy or light. Brown blood is usually present toward the end of your cycle. As your body sheds the uterine lining in the first few days of your cycle, the blood is normally red. However, near the end of your cycle, the discharged blood is older and can be discolored. Sometimes, spotting or brown discharge occurs in the middle of your cycle, during ovulation. This is more common in younger girls who are just starting to have their periods, women starting birth control, or women nearing menopause. Certain types of birth control can cause brown discharge during your period, or even between periods. This can mean that something is wrong with your pregnancy. You may need immediate medical care. Call your doctor if you experience any of the following:

Transcript Audio New Orleans is the latest city to start taking down historical but controversial monuments that many say celebrate slavery and the Confederacy. Angry opponents see the move as suppressing or rewriting history in the service of political correctness. New Orleans is just the latest city to start taking down historical, but controversial monuments that many say celebrate slavery and the Confederacy. William Brangham is back with that. In downtown New Orleans today, workers began removing the historic Robert E. Lee statue from his nearly foot pedestal. New Orleans Mayor Mitch Landrieu: The city dismantled this statue in the broad light of day, but three others were recently taken down under cover of night with no advanced notice. Because of threats of violence, city contractors wore masks and bulletproof vests, and were guarded by police snipers. If there ever was cowardice, this is an act of cowardice and treachery, right here. This is American history, whether you like it or not. This all goes back to a December city council vote to take down these monuments, following an op-ed by city native and jazz musician Wynton Marsalis urging the removal of the monuments. Many have argued it was an appropriate response to the killing of nine black church parishioners that year in Charleston, South Carolina, by avowed white supremacist Dylann Roof. Weeks after that attack, South Carolina removed the Confederate battle flag from its state capitol. Back to today, New Orleans plans to store the statues until it finds an appropriate location for them. But their removal has angered opponents, who see this as suppressing or rewriting history in the service of political correctness. Many years later, when historians or politicians declare a war unjust or immoral, does that negate the ultimate price these soldiers and families paid? Soldiers do not make policy; elected leaders do. Last week in Baton Rouge, the Louisiana Statehouse passed HB, which would require a referendum before any military monument could be renamed or removed. In a show of defiance, black caucus members walked out after vote. Meanwhile last weekend in Charlottesville, Virginia, torch-bearing protesters, including white nationalist Richard Spencer, marched against the removal of a Robert E. The Southern Poverty Law Center counts more than Confederate monuments and statues on public lands across the country. The vast majority of those are in the South. So, is this the right approach for dealing with the darker sides of U. Bryan Stevenson is the founder and executive director of the Equal Justice Initiative. And Walter Isaacson is a historian and writer and president of the Aspen Institute. Welcome to you both. Walter, I would like to start with you first. You are a native of New Orleans. You were there when they are bringing Robert E. Lee down off his pedestal today. As you say, these Confederate monument statues were put up not to honor the nobility of any of these people. It was put up in the s, s as a way to try to reassert white supremacy. New Orleans has had a year history. We have just gone through a hurricane. So, I think there is a big sigh of relief today as the last of these comes down. Bryan Stevenson, what is your reaction to this? How does this sit with you? And I think this legacy of racial inequality and segregation has really put a cloud over New Orleans. And these statues and monuments have reflected that cloud more powerfully than anything. These totems are made of concrete and steel and bronze, but they have been screaming at African-Americans for decades. And what they have been screaming is this narrative of racial difference, this history of white supremacy. So, I think this is long overdue. And part of that has to do with the legacy. I think the real evil of American slavery was this narrative of racial difference we created, the ideology white supremacy that we made up. We said black people are different than white people. Our courts held that black people were only three-fifths human. I think it just evolved. And the proof of that was the erection of these narratives or these monuments and totems, which came after a violent resistance, as Walter said, to racial equality. And they have been there for decades screaming that that narrative of racial difference, that resistance to the end of emancipation, to integration is something worth honoring. I would agree that it was good to have the discussion, too, Bryan, which helped this city. And I said, well, I never paid much attention to Robert E. Lee when you go around Lee Circle. And Wynton said, I did. And that helped us do a dialogue down here, which now is pretty complete. But, Walter, you heard Bryan say that they were screaming, that these statues were screaming about inequality and white superiority. How is a mayor or a governor anywhere in the country supposed to wrestle with that very real boiling anger over these exact moves? Well, I think what happened here in New Orleans is, we spent a lot of time talking about it, and the anger, especially among local citizens, receded. As I said, I just came from Lee Circle. There is a brass band there playing the national anthem. I think that, once we had this catharsis of talking about it, there were people who protested the monuments coming down, but they were all outsiders who had come in from these weird groups around the country. Bryan, one of other criticisms that has been brought up is the potential for a slippery slope here, which is, where do we stop? We have the Washington Monument. We have monuments all over the country that honor people who held slaves. How do we “ where do we draw the line as to what stays and what goes? Lee and Jefferson Davis and people who were the architects and defenders of slavery, people who were actually considered traitors and treasonous, many of whom thought should be hanged after the Civil War. And I think it does matter. We talk about memorials a lot. And we believe in the power of memorials to say something about who we are. We would be absolutely provoked by that. And so there is a way to think about what we honor that reflects who we are, what we think is significant. The greatest person, the most influential person of the 20th century was arguably Adolf Hitler. We would be very provoked by that. And so I do think we have to ask hard questions. And I think, on the question of the Confederacy and the architects and defenders of white supremacy, symbols of resistance to integration, there should be no debate. We cannot move forward if we actually think there is something acceptable about honoring that legacy. Walter, what do you make of that? Is there a slippery slope, is there a line that is clear to you as well as to what stays and what goes? You know, William, all slopes are slippery. Bryan got it right. You say, what was the purpose of this memorial? We have a memorial in this city right behind me “ look over my shoulder “ to Andrew Jackson. So, that memorial is there to honor that. He was a bad slave owner. He had a lot wrong with him. But you have to say, is this a symbol of white supremacy and Confederacy and traitorousness, or is it because he won the Battle of New Orleans? People who say things are slippery slopes, of course they are slippery slopes. All right, Walter Isaacson, Bryan Stephenson, thank you both very much.
