There were four suggestions that would help achieve the vision. Emphasize training with special attention given to mastering fundamentals the individual and small unit tasks that must be mastered to be combat ready , 2. Set the example everything else falls into place , and 4. Never be satisfied; you can always do better. We discussed the importance of completing Ranger School, the best life insurance for the battlefield that a person can have. The subject was Leadership with a focus on Team Building. The presentation and discussion were based on my personal experience in forming, training, and commanding the Eighth Army Ranger Company at the beginning of the Korean War. In introducing me the Congressman praised the book, which he had read previously. There were only three Infantrymen in the 73 enlisted volunteers “ good Soldiers but not Infantry. Three sergeants, 22 corporals, and 48 privates. No experienced Infantry leadership “ including the three new lieutenants just out of Jump School and the Basic Course! My learning curve would have to be very rapid and steep. I listened to my Soldiers. I turned often to Field Manuals. I wished for some mentor as I faced the many challenges posed by developing a combat ready Ranger Company. As I progressed in my career, I kept notes. I learned by listening to and observing others, from reading, and from experience. My focus was on training. I often visited the Rangers during training exercises throughout the continental United States, Alaska, Korea twice , Afghanistan twice and Iraq. During the AAR that always followed, I was asked for comments. I made some well-deserved complimentary remarks after which we discussed ways to improve. Much of what we talked about was not in field manuals and was not taught in service schools. After my visit, I sent a memo to the commander expanding on AAR comments. I realized that a compilation of essays might prove helpful. The book could serve as a reference on lessons learned through experience “ things not taught in our service schools. It would have been invaluable to me not just when I was that green Ranger Company Commander but also in every subsequent assignment. I hope that their dissemination can prove useful to young commanders in particular. If it does, then the years of effort will have been worthwhile.

Wild and rampaging, the Viking warriors were feared by all, masters of the raid attack the Vikings were natural warriors with a disregard for their enemy. Whether they were a Spartan warrior or a Viking the ancient warriors had something in common, their battle skills. Whether you were a master with a sword, or an expert with a bow and arrow, each ancient warrior would have his own unique skills and talents, based on his training and civilisation tactics. War and the Ancient Warrior In the times of war, every ruler would look to his strongest warriors to go into battle. War was not only gruelling and tough, it had serious ramifications on the position of your civilisation. If wars were won, you would generally reap the benefits, in treasure, land or power, and every ruler wanted his army and warriors to succeed. Reputation of the Ancient Warriors In battle your reputation was almost as important as your skills, and the strength of your army. If you could strike fear at just the mere mention of your name, then you already had a massive advantage over the enemy. Of course reputation is typically built on fact, and in the case of the most fearsome and skilled warriors, their reputations always preceded them. Status in Society for the Ancient Warrior To be an ancient warrior would bring many rewards in your realm. In many cases the higher classes would be the best armed and some of the best warriors. However in civilisations like Sparta and ancient Greece, warriors were trained from young and everyone was skilled and masterful on the battlefield. The ancient warriors were revered in all societies, the protectors and saviours of many civilisations. Weapons of the Ancient Warrior The ancient warrior depended on his armoury, having the right weapons to do the job was as important as skill or battle tactics. Each ancient civilisation would have its own bespoke set of weapons, from the ancient Egyptian long range weapon arsenal, to the close range Xiphos sword of the Spartan warriors, and the fearsome Macuahuitl of the Aztec Jaguar and Eagle warriors. Whatever the weapon or civilisations, these ancient warriors spend hours, days, months and years perfecting their tools. When the time came to fight, the ancient warrior would have to rely on his weapon training, and if they had not trained enough the price would be their life. Armour of the Ancient Warrior To defend themselves the ancient warriors of history, would often adorn themselves with armour. The reason was simple, to defend yourself effectively was not always possible, by having armour, the ancient warrior would have some protection should an opponent land a strike.
