Hundreds of thousands of ethnic-Albanians were driven from their homes. Although The Washington Post published a different version, this photo was awarded the World Press Photo of the Year and attracted a lot of attention afterwards. The country was scourged by riots, often aimed at ethnic Chinese and Christians, which escalated in May. A photo sequence of a Christian man being lynched in Jakarta was awarded a second prize in the spot news category. The spot news category also included a photo taken right after the US Embassy bombing in Nairobi, which killed hundreds of people. On the nature front, floods ravaged many countries around the globe in Hurricane Mitch sowed death and destruction in Central America, where historic amounts of rainfall caused catastrophic floods. In Bangladesh, the monsoon floods were among the most extreme that the country ever endured. A spectacular picture of French goalkeeper Fabien Barthez foiling Brazilian superstar striker Ronaldo during the finals won first prize in the sports category. The people in the news category would not have been complete without US President Bill Clinton, whose alleged relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky led to intense media speculation in The year ended with his impeachment by the House of Representatives. In , digital entries were admitted to the World Press Photo Contest for the first time. In , the annual World Press Photo Awards Days debate examined the impact of new technologies on photojournalistic values. The central question was: Do we risk losing our collective visual memory? Photographers and editors attending the discussion proved to be hesitant in their acceptance of digital techniques. Others feared that billions of stored digital images would be lost, as long as a new language of cataloguing was lacking. However, everyone agreed that the future also had much to offer: As David Burnett, chairman of the jury, summed up: We spent so much time in front of a terminal looking at the little egg-timer spinning, waiting for a screen to load.
