Writing Skills are necessary in nearly every facet of life. Provide extra practice in writing sentences and developing paragraphs through helping students to organized their own experiences and ideas.

Nothing strikes fear into the heart of a marketer quite like being asked to write a blog post. Some marketers would rather wrestle with pivot tables or grizzly bears for days on end than write a blog post – but why? Here are 16 ways you can start improving your writing skills right now. For quick and easy online resources, bookmark Grammar Girl and, of course, Merriam Webster. Unfortunately, there are few shortcuts that can transform you into an amazing writer overnight, and even the most talented writers had to learn their craft over a period of many years. If you want to improve your writing skills, writing on a regular basis will not only diminish your fear of the blank page or blinking cursor, it will also help you develop a unique style. So, even if nobody reads it, keep writing. Expand your horizons to more challenging material than you typically read, and pay attention to sentence structure, word choice, and how the material flows. The more you read, the more likely you are to develop an eye for what makes a piece so effective, and which mistakes to avoid. Finding a writing partner is also a great way to hold yourself accountable and keep going. Join a Workshop or Take a Night Class Most people balk at the idea of standing in front of a room full of strangers and baring their soul to the world, but joining a writing workshop can be immensely beneficial – and a lot of fun if you manage to find a good one. These days, content marketing meet-ups and professional development groups are becoming wildly popular. Join one of the many content marketing groups on LinkedIn to meet like-minded writers, or search for writing workshops near you on sites like Meetup. Pick a topic, write something, listen to the feedback of the group, and then revise it. Dissect Writing That You Admire Most people read the same blogs or sites on a regular basis because the material appeals to them – but fewer people understand why their favorite blogs are so appealing. Find a handful of recent blog posts you really like, then print them out. Next, just like your high school English teacher did, take a red pen and highlight things you liked: Examine why you like these elements, and see if there are any common threads in your favored reading material. See how writers take one subject and transition into another. Apply these techniques to your own work. The pacing is excellent, it grabs your attention, and best of all, it keeps you reading. This piece was first published back in June, and I still remember it. Read the full post here, and see how Morris masterfully tells the story of a band named Death and how this relates to writing content. Imitate Writers You Admire Before we go any further, a disclaimer – imitation is not the same as plagiarism. Identify what it is you enjoy about their work, and see if you can use it to improve your writing skills. Does a writer you like use humor to spice up dry topics? Do they use pop culture references to make their work entertaining and useful? Over time, I eventually developed my own style, but reading the works of these writers and seeing how they constructed their essays and books was immensely helpful to me as a writer see tip 3. Remember That Outlines Are Your Friend The blinking cursor of a blank page is a considerable foe, even for the most experienced writers. Before putting pen to proverbial paper, sketch out an outline of what you plan to write. This will be your battle plan, and it will help you win the war. Very few – and I do mean very few – writers sit down to write anything without a solid plan in mind. A simple framework of which sections should appear in a particular order, along with a few sentences about what each section contains, may be enough. If you start to feel lost, refer back to your outline and get back to kicking ass and taking names. I deviated from my initial outline slightly, but the overarching structure was always there to keep me on target. Editing is a tough skill to learn for beginner writers, because they place immense value on the time and effort they put into writing in the first place. However, a lot of writing is actually rewriting, and this is where the cold, hard eye of an editor will serve you well. Develop the discipline it takes to eliminate extraneous words more on this shortly. Resist the temptation to wax lyrically and get to the point. Not sure if a paragraph works? Be tough on yourself, and know when to delete or rework something. Your work will be much stronger as a result. Just get your ideas down on paper first, then go back and start cleaning up. Writing is an iterative process, and even the best writers have to spend a lot of time reworking material they were probably too embarrassed to show anybody. In many cases, shorter sentences can have a greater impact. Baby shoes, never worn. This lengthy sentence is a prime candidate for a ruthless red pen, even if my lame jokes were intended to give it a little more flavor. When I look back at my early work, which I do every so often, it literally makes me cringe. Every now and then but not too often, re-read your earlier work and marvel at how much better you are now than you were then. Pat yourself on the back. This is because far too many bloggers focus on regurgitating the same news as everybody else without bothering to add their own opinions. This makes for more interesting reading. In their eagerness to be done with a blog post or even major newspaper article, many writers try to take shortcuts with the facts. This can range from accidentally fudging a statistic out of haste to being lazy when it comes to sourcing or attribution. Remember Done Is Better than Perfect You should definitely take the time to write as well as you can, proofread and edit your work thoroughly, and ensure that your piece flows logically from one point to the next. Beginning Your Practice Learning to breathe How to sit The monkey mind You may have another outline style that works well for you, but I find the skeletal outline is an easy and quick way to get your ideas on paper as you first get started. Spend some time simply brainstorming and allowing your imagination to create a story in your head. Take some notes while brainstorming. Then come back and begin fleshing out your outline further. Creating your outline will first involve deciding on characters and the roles they will play in your story. Once you have a general idea of the main characters, you can use a skeletal outline for the story, or you can write a brief summary of the story, and then determine how to break down the story into chapters. Determine how you will write. I write my books on my Mac using the Pages word processing software and also use Scrivener. You want to write using something that allows you to easily edit and make changes without wasting a lot of time. Some people really enjoy writing in longhand, as it stimulates creativity and forces you to write slower. A writing schedule with daily goals. This is the most important part of writing your book. You must create a daily or 5 day a week writing habit. Attach your new writing habit to a trigger or cue which prompts you to begin writing. This trigger is a previously-formed automatic behavior, like brushing your teeth or walking the dog. Select a trigger that happens every day and one that occurs at a good time for you to write. Eventually, your new writing habit will be so associated with your trigger that the combination will feel automatic. Start small with a goal of writing words each day for the first week. Then increase the number of words until you reach words a day. That gives you an idea of how much you might try to write each day. Find a spot in your home that you feel is conducive to writing. Do you need music playing? If so, what kind? Do you want a candle? A cup of tea or coffee? Do you need to be near a window? Having all of this determined in advance will help motivate you to get started and to make writing an enjoyable ritual. That consistent writing habit is so important. But it will give you a huge boost to just finish the book and stay committed to the process. Everyone who writes is their own worst critic. Who am I kidding. Some of it may well be crap and need re-working or editing. But you have to start somewhere, so get it all down on paper and then deal with the crap. The most experienced writers have them. Once you finish the book, set it aside for a few days or a couple of weeks. Then go back and read over the entire book again, correcting mistakes, rewriting sections as necessary, cutting out wordy parts, and tightening it up. Find a professional editor. Even the most experienced, professional writers use editors. You also want to make sure the book flows properly, and that your use of words is correct. A good editor polishes and refines the book before publication. The editor checks facts and verifies headings, statistics, data in graphs, and footnote entries. For fiction, the editor will check for consistency and logic and will read with the needs of the audience in mind. Also, it will damage your credibility as a writer. Now publish your book. I could write an entire book on how to publish and market your book. Launch it and get it out there so others can read it, and you can have the satisfaction of having your first published book under your belt. Did you find any value from these tips on writing a book?
